THE ALL ENGLAND LAW REPORTS REPRINT

SCOTT v. AVERY AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Cranworth, L.C., Lord Campbell and Lord Brougham), June 25, July 9, 1855, May 19, July 10, 1856]

2 Jur.N.S. 815; 4 W.R. 746; 10 E.R. 1121]

Arbitration—Ouster of jurisdiction of court—Award of arbitrator on dispute condition precedent to right of action—Dispute to be referred relating to matter other than quantum of damages.

Parties cannot by contract agree to oust the jurisdiction of the courts to deal with their rights under the contract, but a term in a contract which provides that, in the event of a dispute arising, it shall be referred to arbitrators whose award shall be a condition precedent to any right of action in respect of the matters agreed to be referred is valid. This is so not only where the provision for arbitration relates merely to the quantum of damages due from one party to the other, but also where it is stipulated that other matters, e.g., liability, shall be determined in the first instance by arbitrators.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reported 8 Exch. 487, in an action brought by the appellant, as assured, on a policy on a ship effected by him with the respondents as insurers.

- C The appellant, as plaintiff in the action, filed a declaration setting forth the policy in the ordinary way, and the defendant pleaded to that several pleas, the fifth of which set forth the following condition of the policy :

D “The sum to be paid by this association [the respondents] to any suffering member for any loss or damage shall in the first instance be ascertained and settled by the committee, and the suffering member, if he agrees to accept such sum in full satisfaction of his claim, shall be entitled to demand and sue for the same as soon as the amount to be paid has been so ascertained and settled, but not before, which can only be claimed according to the customary mode of payment in use by the society; and if a difference shall arise between the committee [association] and any suffering member relative to the settling of any loss or damage, or to a claim for average, or any other matter relating to the insurance, in such case the member dissatisfied shall select one arbitrator on his or her behalf, and the committee shall select another; and if the committee refuse for fourteen days to make such selection, the suffering member shall select two; and in either case the two selected shall forthwith select a third, which three arbitrators, or any two of them, shall decide upon the claims and matters in dispute according to the rules and customs of the club, to be proved on oath by the secretary; and on such arbitration the party demanding it shall state the sum which he claims, and shall be allowed such proportion of the expenses occasioned by the arbitration as the sum awarded to him bears to the sum demanded, and the residue of such expenses shall be borne by him and deducted from the sum awarded to him. And in all cases where arbitration is resorted to, the settlement of the committee to be wholly rescinded, and the statement begun de novo. Provided always, and it is hereby expressly declared to be a part of the contract of insurance between the members of the association, that no member who refuses to accept the amount of any loss as settled by the committee in manner hereinbefore specified, in full satisfaction of such loss, shall be entitled to maintain any action at law or suit in equity on his policy, until the matters in dispute shall have been referred to and decided by arbitrators appointed as hereinbefore specified, and then only for such sum as the said arbitrators shall award; and the obtaining the decision of such arbitrators on the matters and claims in dispute is hereby declared to be a condition precedent to the right of any member to maintain any such action or suit.”

- I The plea then stated that a difference had arisen between the plaintiff and the committee, and the loss had never been ascertained and settled, but that the defendants were willing to have it settled and the plaintiff was not willing.

The Court of Exchequer gave judgment for the plaintiff, but that decision was reversed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and the plaintiff appealed to the House of Lords.

The following learned judges attended: ALDERSON, B., COLERIDGE, J., CRESSWELL, J., WIGHTMAN, J., MARTIN, B., CROMPTON, J., and CROWDER, J., and to them. at the conclusion of the argument, this question was left—whether, looking to the record, judgment ought to be given for the appellant or for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19, 1856. The learned judges delivered their judgments, COLERIDGE, J., CRESSWELL, J., WIGHTMAN, J., and CROWDER, J., being in favour of the respondents, and ALDERSON, B., MARTIN, B., and CROMPTON, J., in favour of the appellant.

July 10, 1856. The following opinions were read.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—The question appears to me to be one merely of construction of the policy in question. For there is no doubt of the general principle, which was argued at your Lordships' Bar, that parties cannot by contract oust the ordinary courts of their jurisdiction.

That has been decided in many cases. Perhaps the first case I need refer to was a case decided about a century ago, Kill v. Hollister (1). That was an action on a policy in which there was a clause that in case of any loss or dispute it should be referred to arbitration. It was decided there that an action would lie, although no reference had been made to arbitration. After a lapse of about half a century, occurred a case before LORD KENYON—and probably many other cases, from the language that fell from that learned judge, had been decided, which are not reported—but in the time of LORD KENYON occurred a case which is considered the leading case upon this subject, Thompson v. Charnock (2). That was an action upon a charterparty, in which there was a stipulation that if any difference should arise it should be referred to arbitration. That clause was pleaded in bar to the action which had been brought upon a breach of the covenant with an averment that the defendant had been and always was ready to refer the matter to arbitration. That was held to be a bad plea upon the ground that a right of action had accrued, and that the fact that the parties had agreed that the matter should be settled by arbitration did not oust the jurisdiction of the courts. Just about the same time occurred a case in the Court of Common Pleas, when that court was presided over by LORD ELDON—Tattersall v. Groote (3). That was an action by the administratrix of a deceased partner against a surviving partner for not naming an arbitrator pursuant to a covenant in the deed of partnership. To that action there was a demurrer, and the demurrer was allowed. But that case I think can afford very little authority in the present action, or in actions similar to the present, because there the covenant was only that, if any dispute arose between the partners, they should name an arbitrator. One of the partners died, and his administratrix brought an action, and LORD ELDON pointed out that the covenant did not apply to a case where one of the partners was dead and an action was brought by his representative. Therefore, in truth, that amounts to no decision whatever upon the general question. There was a case before LORD KENYON at the Rolls, Halfhide v. Fenning (4), in which he held a different doctrine. That was a bill for an account of partnership transactions. The plea to that bill was that the articles contained an agreement that any differences which should arise should be settled by arbitration; and LORD KENYON allowed that plea. But I think that case cannot be relied upon, and it has been universally treated as having proceeded upon an erroneous principle, because, no doubt, where a right of action has accrued, parties cannot by contract say that there shall not be jurisdiction to enforce damages for a breach of that contract.

This doctrine depends upon the general policy of the law, that parties cannot enter into a contract which gives rise to a right of action for the breach of it, and then withdraw the jurisdiction on such a case from the ordinary tribunals. But surely there can be no principle or policy of the law which prevents parties from entering into such a contract as that no breach shall occur until after a reference

A has been made to arbitration. It appears to me that in such cases as that the policy of the law is left untouched; and that, I take it, is what was alluded to by LORD HARDWICKE in Wellington v. Mackintosh (5), which was this. The articles of partnership in that case contained a covenant that any dispute should be referred. A bill was filed by one of the partners, and a plea set up that covenant to refer as a bar to the bill. LORD HARDWICKE overruled the plea, but said that the parties might have so framed the deed as to oust the jurisdiction of the court. I take it that what LORD HARDWICKE meant was, that the parties might have so framed the stipulation among themselves that no right of action or right of suit should arise until a reference had been previously made to arbitration. I think it may be illustrated thus. If I covenant with A. to do particular acts, and it is also covenanted between us that any question that may arise as to the breach of the covenant shall be referred to arbitration, that latter covenant does not prevent the covenantee from bringing an action. A right of action has accrued, and it would be against the policy of the law to give effect to an agreement that such a right should not be enforced through the medium of the ordinary tribunals, but if I covenant with A.B. that if I do or omit to do a certain act, then I will pay to him such a sum as I.S. shall award as the amount of damage sustained by him, then, until I.S. has made his award and I have omitted to pay the sum awarded, my covenant has not been broken and no right of action has arisen.

The policy of the law does not prevent parties from so contracting; and the question is here: What is the contract? Does any right of action exist until the amount of damage has been ascertained in the specified mode? I think, clearly not. The stipulation is that the sum to be paid to the suffering member shall be settled by the committee. If he does not agree with the committee as to what the amount is, then the committee shall name one arbitrator and he shall name another, and these two arbitrators shall name an umpire, and they shall determine what the amount is, and that shall be the amount recovered. There is the express stipulation that the obtaining of the decision of the arbitrators on the matters and claims in dispute is hereby declared to be a condition precedent to the right of any member to maintain any such action or suit. That the meaning of the parties, therefore, was that the sum to be recovered should be only such a sum as, if not agreed upon in the first instance between the committee and the suffering member, should be decided by arbitration, and that the sum so ascertained by arbitration, and no other, should be the sum to be recovered, appears to me to be clear beyond all possibility of controversy; and, if that was their meaning, the circumstance that they have not stated that meaning in the clearest terms or in the most artistic manner is a matter utterly unimportant. What the court below had to do was to ascertain what was the meaning of the parties as deduced from the language they have used. It appears to me perfectly clear that the language used indicated this to have been their intention—that, supposing there was a difference between the person who had suffered loss or damage and the committee as to what amount he should recover, that was to be ascertained in a particular mode, and, until that mode had been adopted and the amount ascertained according to that mode, no right of action should exist—in other words, that the right of action should be, not for what a jury should say was the amount of the loss, but for what the persons designated in that particular form of agreement should so say.

It was argued that here the arbitrators were to decide, not the mere amount, but other matters, as, for instance, what average was to be allowed, whether there had been a loss, and a variety of other matters, which were ingeniously argued at your Lordships' Bar. In the first place, if that were so, it would not necessarily change my view of the case. I am not at all clear that it is not so. I observe the learned judges differed about that. I do not think it necessary to go into that, because I am quite prepared to say that, in my view of the case, that makes no difference at all. If, in consideration of a sum of money paid to me by A.B., I agree with him that, in case I.S. should decide that he, A.B., had fulfilled certain conditions and had sustained certain damage, and I.S. should make his award accordingly, I would pay to A.B. the sum so ascertained and awarded, no right of action would exist until I.S. had made his award. I do not go into the question, therefore, whether in this case, according to the true construction of the contract, the amount of damage alone is to be ascertained, because, in my view of the case, the principle goes much farther. A

It appears to me perfectly clear that, until the award was made, no right of action accrued, and consequently the judgment of the court below, reversing the judgment of the Court of Exchequer and allowing the plea, was a perfectly correct judgment. Your Lordships have had the benefit of having this case argued before the learned judges. The learned judges differed in their opinion. There was a majority, but a bare majority, in favour of the view which I have taken of this case. Whichever way the preponderance of opinion among the learned judges may be, and however great it may be either way, the ultimate decision rests with your Lordships, but it is always satisfactory to know that the view taken by your Lordships is in concurrence with the opinion of the learned judges. Here it is in concurrence with the opinion of a majority, though but a slender majority, of those learned judges. I, therefore, humbly move your Lordships that the judgment below be affirmed, and that judgment be given for the respondents, with costs. B C

LORD CAMPBELL.—After a very deliberate and dispassionate consideration of the case, I have come to the same conclusion as my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. It appears to me, I confess, to be very clear (with great deference to the dissenting judges) that, upon principle, and without overturning any authority, your Lordships ought to affirm the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber. In the first place, I think that the contract between the shipowner and the underwriters in this case is quite clear—as clear as the English language could make it—that no action should be brought against the insurers until the arbitrators had disposed of any dispute that might arise between them. It is declared to be a condition precedent to the bringing of any action. There is no doubt that such was the intention of the parties; and, upon a deliberate view of the condition of the policy, I am of opinion that it embraces not only the assessment of damages, the computation of quantum, but also any dispute that might arise between the underwriters and the insured respecting the liability of the insurers as well as the amount to be paid. If there had been any question about want of seaworthiness, or deviation, or a breach of blockade had been committed, I am clearly of opinion that upon a just construction of this instrument, until those questions had been determined by the arbitrators, no right of action could have accrued to the insured. D E F

That being the intention of the parties, about which I believe there is no dispute, is the contract illegal? There is an express undertaking that no action shall be brought until the arbitrators have decided, and there is abundant consideration for that in the mutual contract into which the parties have entered. Therefore, unless there be some illegality in the contract, the courts are bound to give it effect. There is no statute against such a contract. Then on what ground is it to be declared to be illegal? It is contended that it is contrary to public policy. That is rather a dangerous ground to go upon. I say it with great deference before your Lordships after the view that was taken in a very important case lately decided in this House (Egerton v. Earl Brownlow (6)). But what pretence can there be for saying that there is anything contrary to public policy in allowing parties to contract that they shall not be liable to any action until their liability has been ascertained by a domestic and private tribunal upon which they themselves agree? Can the public be injured by it? It seems to me that it would be a most inexpedient encroachment upon the liberty of the subject, if he were not allowed to enter into such a contract. Take the case of an insurance club, of which there are many in the north of England. Is there anything contrary to public policy in saying that the company shall not be harassed by actions to be brought against them, the costs of which might be ruinous, but that any dispute that arises shall be referred to a domestic tribunal, which may speedily and economically determine the dispute? I G H I

A can see not the slightest ill consequence that can flow from such a liberty, and I see great advantage that may arise from it. Public policy, therefore, seems to me to require that effect should be given to the contract.

When we come to the decided cases, if there were any decision that had not been reviewed by your Lordships which adjudged such a contract to be illegal, I should ask your Lordships to reverse it, for it would seem to me really to stand on no principle whatsoever. I know that there has been a very great inclination in the courts for a good many years to throw obstacles in the way of arbitration. I wish to speak with great respect of my predecessors the judges; but I must just let your Lordships into the secret of that tendency. There is no disguising the fact that as formerly the emoluments of the judges depended mainly or almost entirely upon fees and they had no fixed salary, there was great competition to get as much as possible of litigation into Westminster Hall, and a great scramble in Westminster Hall for the division of the spoil, and hence the disputes between the different courts about the effect of a latitat, a capias, and a quo minus—the latitat bringing business into the Court of Queen's Bench, the capias into the Common Pleas, and the quo minus into the Exchequer. They had great jealousy of arbitrations, whereby Westminster Hall was robbed of those cases which came neither into the Queen's Bench, nor the Common Pleas, nor the Exchequer. Therefore, they said that the courts ought not to be ousted of their jurisdiction, and that it was contrary to the policy of the law. But, my Lords, that really grew up only subsequently to the time of Lord Coke, whose memory I revere, and whose authority I am always anxious to support where I can. There is a saying of Lord Coke's which is the original foundation of this doctrine. It is this:

E "If a man make a lease for life, and by deed grant that if any waste or destruction be done it shall be redressed by neighbours, and not by suit or plea, notwithstanding an action of waste shall lie, for the place wasted cannot be recovered without a verdict of the neighbour being first had and obtained."

Where an action is indispensable you cannot oust the court of its jurisdiction over the subject, because justice cannot be done without a plea. This is the foundation of the doctrine that the courts are not to be ousted of their jurisdiction.

I am glad to think that there is no case that I am aware of that will be overturned by your Lordships affirming the judgment now in dispute. Because all that has been hitherto decided in Thompson v. Charnock (2) and the other cases referred to is this—that if the contract between the parties simply contains a clause or covenant to refer to arbitration, and goes no further, then an action may be brought in spite of that clause, although there has been no arbitration. But there is no case that goes the length of saying that where the contract is, as it is here, that no right of action shall accrue until there has been an arbitration, then an action may be brought, although there has been no arbitration. In this contract of insurance, it is stipulated in the most express terms that, until the arbitrators have determined, no action shall lie in any court whatsoever. That is not ousting the courts of their jurisdiction, because they have no jurisdiction whatsoever, and no cause of action accrues until the arbitrators have determined. Therefore, without overturning Thompson v. Charnock (2), and the other cases to the same effect, your Lordships may hold that in this case, where it is expressly, directly, and unequivocally agreed upon between the parties that there shall be no right of action whatever till the arbitrators have decided, it is a bar to the action that there has been no such arbitration.

It gives me great satisfaction to know that while this case has been pending, there has been a decision bearing on this question in the Court of Exchequer, in which this case arose. That case is expressly in point, and it seems to me further to show that this judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought to be affirmed. That case was decided in Hilary Term of the present year. It is Brown v. Overbury (7). It was an action on a horse-race. The winner, who had contributed to the sweepstakes, said that his horse had won, and he brought an action against the stakeholder to recover the stakes. But it was a condition in the race that if any dispute arose the stewards should decide. He first attempted to say that the stewards had decided, but it turned out that the stewards had not decided, for they differed in opinion. Then he attempted to show that his horse had won, but the judge held that he could not go into that even if the horse could clearly be shown to have won, because the action had not accrued till the arbitrators, the stewards, had determined, and so the plaintiff was nonsuited. The case was brought before the Court of Exchequer, and they unanimously concurred in the ruling of the judge at nisi prius, and upon the very reason that it was part of the contract that the stewards should decide and not a jury, and that it could not be brought before a jury till the stewards had determined, and they would not allow the plaintiff to recover either the sweepstakes or his own contribution: and the nonsuit was confirmed. I cannot distinguish that case in principle from the present. Substitute stewards for arbitrators, and it is the same question, whether it is a contract of insurance or a contract upon a horse-race (which by Act of Parliament is legal). The Court of Exchequer held that in that case the action could not be maintained until the stewards had decided, and that, therefore, it was a good defence to the action that the stewards had not decided. Here the plea is, that the arbitrators have not decided as to the liability of the underwriters or the amount to be recovered, and, therefore, an action will not lie. That seems to me to be a strong authority in point, and calculated to remove any scruples that any of your Lordships may have in maintaining the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which reversed the judgment of the Court of Exchequer.

For these reasons I am happy to say that I entirely concur in the view of this case taken by my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, and I think that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—I have communicated with LORD BROUGHAM, who is absent in consequence of illness, and he authorises me to say that he entirely concurs in the view which myself and my noble and learned friend have taken of this case.

Appeal dismissed.

Sale of Land—Restrictive covenant—Enforcement—Enforcement against person claiming under original purchaser.

A covenant between vendor and purchaser on the sale of land that the purchaser and his assigns shall use or abstain from using the land in a particular way will be enforced in equity against all subsequent purchasers with notice, independently of the question whether it be one which runs with the land so as to be binding upon subsequent purchasers at law.

Schreiber v. Creed (1839), 10 Sim. 9.

Appeal by the defendant from an order of LORD LANGDALE, M.R., in an action for an injunction.

In 1808 the plaintiff, being then the owner in fee of a vacant piece of ground in Leicester Square, London, as well as of several of the houses forming the square, sold the piece of ground by the description of E

"Leicester Square Garden or Pleasure Ground, with the equestrian statue then standing in the centre thereof and the iron railing and stone work round the same,"

to one Elms in fee. The deed of conveyance contained a covenant by Elms, for himself, his heirs, and assigns, with the plaintiff, his heirs, executors, and administrators F

"that Elms, his heirs, and assigns should, and would from time to time, and at all times thereafter at his and their own costs and charges, keep and maintain the said piece of ground and square garden and the iron railing round the same in its then form, and in sufficient and proper repair as a square garden and pleasure ground, in an open state, uncovered with any buildings, in neat and ornamental order; and that it should be lawful for the inhabitants of Leicester Square, tenants of the plaintiff, on payment of a reasonable rent for the same, to have keys at their own expense and the privilege of admission therewith at any time or times into the said square garden and pleasure ground." G

The piece of land so conveyed passed by divers mesne conveyances into the hands of the defendant, whose purchase deed contained no similar covenant with his vendor, but he admitted that he had purchased with notice of the covenant in the deed of 1808. The defendant having manifested an intention to alter the character of the square garden, and asserted a right, if he thought fit, to build upon it, the plaintiff, who remained owner of several houses in the square, filed this bill for an injunction. An injunction was granted by the Master of the Rolls, to restrain the defendant from converting or using the piece of ground and square garden and the iron railing round the same to or for any other purpose than as a square garden and pleasure ground in an open state, and uncovered with buildings. The defendant moved to discharge that order. H

Rolt for the plaintiff was not called on to argue.

- A LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.—That this court has jurisdiction to enforce a contract between the owner of land and his neighbour purchasing a part of it that the purchaser shall either use or abstain from using the land purchased in a particular way is what I never knew disputed. Here there is no question about the contract. The owner of certain houses in the square sells the land adjoining, with a covenant from the purchaser not to use it for any other purpose than as a square garden.
- B It is now contended, not that the vendee could violate that contract, but that he might sell the piece of land, and that the purchaser from him may violate it without this court having any power to interfere. If that were so, it would be impossible for an owner of land to sell part of it without incurring the risk of rendering what he retains worthless. It is said that, the covenant being one which does not run with the land, this court cannot enforce it, but the question is not whether the covenant runs with the land, but whether a party shall be permitted to use the land in a manner inconsistent with the contract entered into by his vendor, with notice of which he purchased. Of course, the price would be affected by the covenant, and nothing could be more inequitable than that the original purchaser should be able to sell the property the next day for a greater price, in consideration of the assignee being allowed to escape from the liability which he had himself undertaken.
- D That the question does not depend upon whether the covenant runs with the land is evident from this, that, if there was a mere agreement and no covenant, this court would enforce it against a party purchasing with notice of it, for if an equity is attached to property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from that of the party from whom he purchased. There are not only cases before the Vice-Chancellor of England, in which he considered that doctrine as not in dispute, but looking at the ground on which LORD ELDON disposed of Duke of Bedford v. British Museum Trustees (1), it is impossible to suppose that he entertained any doubt of it. In Mann v. Stephens (2) before me, I never intended to make the injunction depend upon the result of the action, nor does the order imply it. The motion was, to discharge an order for the commitment of the defendant for an alleged breach of the injunction, and also
- F to dissolve the injunction. I upheld the injunction, but discharged the order of commitment on the ground that it was not clearly proved that any breach had been committed, but, there being a doubt whether part of the premises on which the defendant was proceeding to build, was locally situated within what was called the Dell, on which alone he had under the covenant a right to build, and the plaintiff insisting that it was not, I thought the pendency of the suit ought not to
- G prejudice the plaintiff in his right to bring an action if he thought he had such right, and, therefore, I gave him liberty to do so.
- With respect to the observations of LORD BROUGHAM in Keppell v. Bailey (3), he never could have meant to lay down, that this court would not enforce an equity attached to land by the owner unless under such circumstances as would maintain an action at law. If that be the result of his observations, I can only say that I
- H cannot coincide with it. I think this decision of the Master of the Rolls perfectly right, and, therefore, that this motion must be refused with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

HOCHSTER v. DE LA TOUR

Contract—Future contract—Repudiation—Repudiation before date of commencement of performance—Right of other party to sue immediately.

Where a party to an executory agreement, before the time fixed for performance, breaks the agreement either by disabling himself from fulfilling it, or by renouncing it, an action will lie at the suit of the other party for the breach before the time specified for the fulfilment of the agreement.

Accordingly, where the defendant engaged the plaintiff to render him certain services beginning on June 1, 1852, and on May 11 informed him that he would not employ him as agreed and refused him compensation,

Held: the plaintiff was entitled to bring an action for the breach of the contract by writ dated May 22.

- D Rule Nisi to enter a nonsuit or arrest judgment in an action for damages for breach of contract.

The plaintiff pleaded that by a contract dated April 12, 1852, he agreed that on June 1, 1852, he would enter into the service of the defendant in the capacity of a courier and travel with him on the continent of Europe for three months from June 1, 1852, on which day he undertook to be ready to start with the defendant on such travels, his remuneration being £10 a month. He alleged that on May 11 the defendant wrote to him stating that he had changed his mind and refusing to employ him as agreed or to give him any compensation. The plaintiff began the present action on May 22.

On the trial, before ERLE, J., these facts were proved, and also that, between the commencement of the action and June 1, the plaintiff obtained an engagement with Lord Ashburton, on equally good terms, but not commencing till July 4. The defendant's counsel contended that there could be no breach of the contract before June 1. The learned judge was of a contrary opinion, but he reserved leave to enter a nonsuit on this argument. The other questions were left to the jury, who found for the plaintiff. A rule nisi to enter a nonsuit, or arrest the judgment, was obtained on behalf of the defendant.

- G Hannen showed cause against the rule.
Hugh Hill and Deighton supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 25, 1853. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., read the following judgment of the court.—On this motion in arrest of judgment, the question arises, whether, if there be an agreement between A. and B., whereby B. engages to employ A. on and from a future day for a given period of time, to travel with him into a foreign country as a courier and to start with him in that capacity on that day, A. being to receive a monthly salary during the continuance of such service, B. may, before the day, refuse to perform the agreement and break and renounce it so as to entitle A., before the day, to commence an action against B. to recover damages for breach of the agreement, A. having been ready and willing to perform it till it was broken and renounced by B.

The defendant's counsel very powerfully contended that, if the plaintiff was not contented to dissolve the contract and to abandon all remedy upon it, he was bound to remain ready and willing to perform it till the day when the actual employment as courier in the service of the defendant was to begin, and that there could be no breach of the agreement, before that day, to give a right of action. But it cannot be laid down as a universal rule that, where by agreement an act is to be done on a future day, no action can be brought for a breach of the agreement till the day for doing the act has arrived. If a man promises to marry a woman on a future day and before that day marries another woman, he is instantly liable to an action for breach of promise of marriage: Short v. Stone (1). If a man contracts to execute a lease on and from a future day for a certain term, and, before that day, executes a lease to another for the same term, he may be immediately sued for breaking the contract: Ford v. Tiley (2). So, if a man contracts to sell and deliver specific goods on a future day, and before the day he sells and delivers them to another, he is immediately liable to an action at the suit of the person with whom he first contracted to sell and deliver them: Bowdell v. Parsons (3). One reason alleged in support of such an action is that the defendant has, before the day, rendered it impossible for the plaintiff to perform the contract at the day, but this does not necessarily follow, for, prior to the day fixed for doing the act, the first wife may have died, a surrender of the lease executed might be obtained, and the defendant might have re-purchased the goods so as to be in a situation to sell and deliver them to the plaintiff. Another reason may be that where there is a contract to do an act on a future day there is a relation constituted between the parties in the meantime by the contract, and that they impliedly promise that in the meantime neither will do any thing to the prejudice of the other inconsistent with that relation. As an example, a man and woman engaged to marry are affianced to one another during the period between the time of the engagement and the celebration of the marriage.

In the present case, of traveller and courier, from the day of the hiring till the day when the employment was to begin, the parties were engaged to each other, and it seems to be a breach of an implied contract if either of them renounces the engagement. This reasoning seems in accordance with the unanimous decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Elderton v. Emmens (4), which we have followed in subsequent cases in this court. The declaration in the present case, in alleging a breach, states a great deal more than a passing intention on the part of the defendant which he may repent of, and could only be proved by evidence that he had utterly renounced the contract or done some act which rendered it impossible for him to perform it. If the plaintiff has no remedy for breach of the contract unless he treats the contract as in force, and acts upon it down to June 1, 1852, it follows that, till then, he must enter into no employment which will interfere with his promise "to start with the defendant on such travels on the day and year," and that he must then be properly equipped in all respects as a courier for a three months' tour on the continent of Europe.

But it is surely much more rational, and more for the benefit of both parties, that, after the renunciation of the agreement by the defendant, the plaintiff should be at liberty to consider himself absolved from any future performance of it, retaining his right to sue for any damage he has suffered from the breach of it. Thus, instead of remaining idle and laying out money in preparations which must be useless, he is at liberty to seek service under another employer, which would go in mitigation of the damages to which he would otherwise be entitled for a breach of the contract. It seems strange that the defendant, after renouncing the contract, and absolutely declaring that he will never act under it, should be permitted to object that faith is given to his assertion, and that an opportunity is not left to him of changing his mind. If the plaintiff is barred of any remedy by entering into an engagement inconsistent with starting as a courier with the defendant on June 1, he is prejudiced by putting faith in the defendant's assertion, and it would be more consonant with principle, if the defendant were precluded from saying that he had not broken the contract when he declared that he entirely renounced it.

Suppose that the defendant, at the time of his renunciation, had embarked on a voyage for Australia, so as to render it physically impossible for him to employ the plaintiff as a courier on the continent of Europe in the months of June, July and August, 1852. According to decided cases the action might have been brought before June 1, but the renunciation may have been founded on other facts, to be given in evidence, which would equally have rendered the defendant's performance

A of the contract impossible. The man who wrongfully renounces a contract into which he has deliberately entered cannot justly complain if he is immediately sued for a compensation in damages by the man whom he has injured: and it seems reasonable to allow an option to the injured party, either to sue immediately or to wait till the time when the act was to be done, still holding it as prospectively binding for the exercise of this option, which may be advantageous to the innocent party, and cannot be prejudicial to the wrongdoer.

B An argument against the action before June 1 is urged from the difficulty of calculating the damages, but this argument is equally strong against an action before Sept. 1, when the three months would expire. In either case, the jury in assessing the damages would be justified in looking to all that had happened, or was likely to happen, to increase or mitigate the loss of the plaintiff down to the day of trial.

C We do not find any decision contrary to the view we are taking of this case. Leigh v. Paterson (5) only shows that, upon a sale of goods to be delivered at a certain time, if the vendor before the time gives information to the vendee that he cannot deliver them, having sold them, the vendee may calculate the damages according to the state of the market when they ought to have been delivered. If D this was a sale of specific goods, the action, according to Bowdell v. Parsons (3), might have been brought before that time, as soon as the vendor had sold and delivered them to another. Phillpotts v. Evans (6) was a similar case, and the only question there was as to the mode of calculating the damages on a breach of contract for the sale and delivery of wheat. The court very properly held that the plaintiff was entitled to damages according to the state of the market when the E wheat was to be delivered, the court professing to proceed upon the rule laid down in Startup v. Cortazzi (7), where no question arose as to the right to bring an action before the stipulated day of delivery on a renunciation of the contract. PARKE, B., whose dicta are entitled to very great weight, certainly does say in Phillpotts v. Evans (6), with reference to the notice by the defendants that they would not accept the corn:

F "I think no action would then have lain for the breach of the contract, but that the plaintiffs were bound to wait until the time arrived for delivery of the wheat, to see whether the defendant would then receive it."

G But the learned judge might suppose that the notice did not amount to a renunciation of the contract, and, if he thought that after such a renunciation the plaintiffs were bound to proceed with the performance of the contract on their part, and to incur expense and loss in tendering the wheat before they could have any remedy on the contract, we cannot agree with him. In Ripley v. McClure (8) it is said that, under a contract for the sale and delivery of goods, a refusal to receive them at any time before they ought to be delivered was not necessarily a breach of the contract, but the court intimated no opinion upon the question whether, there H being a contract to do an act at a future day, if one party before the day renounces the contract, the other thereupon has a remedy for a breach of the contract. They held that a refusal by one party before the day when the act is to be done, if unretracted, would be evidence of a continual refusal down to, and inclusive of, the time when the act was to be done.

I The only other case cited in the argument which we think it necessary to notice is Planché v. Colburn (9), which appears to be an authority for the plaintiff. There the defendants had engaged the plaintiff to write a treatise for a periodical publication. The plaintiff commenced the composition of the treatise, but, before he had completed it, and before the time when in the course of conducting the publication it would have appeared in print, the publication was abandoned. The plaintiff, thereupon, without completing the treatise, brought an action for breach of contract. Objection was made that the plaintiff could not recover on the special contract for want of having completed, tendered and delivered the treatise, according to the contract. TINDAL, C.J., said (8 Bing. at p. 15):

"The fact was, that the defendants not only suspended, but actually put an end to, 'THE JUVENILE LIBRARY'; they had broken their contract with the plaintiff." A

The declaration contained counts for work and labour, but the plaintiff appears to have retained his verdict on the count framed on the special contract, thus showing that, in the opinion of the court, the plaintiff might treat the renunciation of the contract by the defendants as a breach and maintain an action for that breach without considering that it remained in force so as to bind him to perform his part of it before bringing an action for the breach of it. B

If it should be held that, upon a contract to do an act on a future day, a renunciation of the contract by one party dispenses with a condition to be performed in the meantime by the other, there seems no reason for requiring that other to wait till the day arrives before seeking his remedy by action, and the only ground on which the condition can be dispensed with seems to be that the renunciation may be treated as a breach of the contract. Upon the whole, we think that the declaration in this case is sufficient. It gives us great satisfaction to reflect that, the question being on the record, our opinion may be reviewed in a court of error. In the meantime we must give judgment for the plaintiff. C

FOLEY v. HILL AND OTHERS

[Reported 2 H.L.Cas. 28; 9 E.R. 1002]

Bank—Banker and customer—Relationship—Debtor and creditor—No fiduciary relation.

The relation between a banker and his customer who pays money into the bank is that of debtor and creditor, the banker being liable to repay to the customer the money which he holds for him when required to do so by the customer. When a customer pays money into his account at a bank it ceases to be his money; it becomes the banker's money and he can deal with it as his own. He is not vis-à-vis the customer in the fiduciary position of a trustee or quasi-trustee holding the money for the customer as for a cestui que trust. G

Notes. It will be seen that a question was raised in this case whether in the circumstances the appellant's claim for an account was a fit subject for a suit in a court of equity. This would depend on whether at law there was no satisfactory remedy or whether from the complexity of the account it was not a fit case to be referred to a jury. But by s. 36 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925, re-enacting s. 24 of the Judicature Act, 1873, law and equity are now to be administered concurrently, so that the discussion of the above question is no longer of value, and counsel's argument and their Lordships' observations on that matter have been omitted from this report. Appeal against an order of LORD LYNDBURST, L.C., reported 1 Ph. 399, reversing a decree of the Vice-Chancellor of England (KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C.) and dismissing the appellant's bill.

- In and previously to the year 1829, the appellant and Sir Edward Scott, owners of collieries in Staffordshire, kept a joint account at the respondents' bank at Stourbridge, in Worcestershire. In April, 1829, a sum of £6,117 10s. was transferred from that account to a separate account then opened for the appellant, and the respondents, in a letter enclosing a receipt for the sum so transferred, agreed to allow £3 per cent. interest on it. From 1829 to the end of 1834, when the joint account was closed, the appellant's share of the profits of the collieries was from time to time paid by cheques drawn by the colliery agents against the joint account. These cheques were, as the respondents alleged, paid in cash or by bills drawn by them on their London bankers in favour of the appellant, and none of them was entered in his separate account. The only items found in that account were the £6,117 10s. on the credit side, and two sums of £1,700 and £2,000 on the debit side, both being payments made to or on behalf of the appellant in 1830. There were also entries, in a separate column, of interest calculated on the sum or balance in the bank, up to Dec. 25, 1831, and not afterwards.
- H In January, 1838, the appellant filed his bill against the respondents, praying that an account might be taken of the sum of £6,117 10s. and all other sums received by the respondents for the appellant on his private account since April, 1829, with interest on the same at the rate of £3 per cent. per annum; and also an account of all sums properly paid by them for or to the use of the appellant on his account since that day, and that they might be decreed to pay the appellant what, upon taking such accounts, should be found due to him. A schedule annexed to the defendants' answer set forth the separate account of the appellant from the bank book, containing the items and entries before mentioned. The vice-chancellor, on the hearing of the cause, decreed for an account as prayed, being of opinion that the respondents were bound in duty to keep the account clear; that they were to be charged according to their duty, the neglect of which could be no excuse, and that the agreement to allow the interest was in effect the same, in answer to the Statute of Limitations, as if the interest had been regularly entered or paid. LORD A LYNDHURST, taking a different view of the case, upon appeal, held, first, that the Statute of Limitations was a sufficient defence; and, secondly, that the account, consisting of only a few simple items, was not a proper subject for a bill in equity, but a case for an action at law for money had and received, and his Lordship reversed the decree, and dismissed the bill.

Stuart and G. L. Russell for the appellant.—The judgment appealed from pro- B ceeded partly on the ground that the Statute of Limitations is a bar to the appellant's demand, and partly on the ground that the account prayed for is a simple account of debtor and creditor, and, therefore, not a fit subject for a suit in equity.
The question is: What is the nature of the relation between a banker and those who deposit money with him, and who are called his customers? If it could be C shown that a banker is in the position of a trustee for those who employ him, that he is clothed with a fiduciary character in relation to them, and that there is a personal trust and confidence in him, then the Statute of Limitations would be inapplicable, and the second defence also must be held to fail. The respondents were not in the relation of mere debtors to the appellant for the money deposited, which, in ordinary cases, is considered to be a loan, and, therefore, a debt: Carr v.
Carr (1); Devaynes v. Noble, Sleech's Case (2) (1 Mer. at p. 568); Sims v. Bond (3); D Pott v. Clegg (4). POLLOCK, C.B., in Pott v. Clegg (4), doubted whether in all cases there was not an implied contract between a banker and his customer as to the money deposited which distinguishes it from an ordinary case of loan, but he yielded to the opinion of the other judges that it was a simple loan and debt.
It may be admitted that bankers are debtors, but they are debtors with superadded obligations, as, for instance, to repay the money deposited by honouring the E depositor's cheques: Marzetti v. Williams (5). In the present case there was an additional obligation by the special contract to pay interest on the deposit. It was the duty of the respondents to keep the accounts with the appellant clear and intelligible, to calculate the interest on the balances in their hands from time to time, to make proper entries of it in the account, and to preserve all vouchers and other evidence of their transactions with him. These duties and transactions consti- F tute a relation more complex than that of mere debtor and creditor, and an account of them is a fit subject for a bill in equity, because the account here sought is of moneys received by the respondents, the receipt of which is within their own knowledge, and the entries and record of which they were bound to keep.

Bethell, Kenyon Parker and Craig for the respondents, were not called on to G argue.

LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.—The bill in this case—as is usual in cases of this description where bills state matters of account, and where there is concurrent jurisdiction at law and equity—alleges that the account is complicated and consists of a great variety of items, so that it could not be properly taken at law. If that allegation had been made out, it would have prevented the necessity of considering H any other part of the case. But that allegation has entirely failed of proof, for it appears that the account consisted of only one payment of £6,117 10s. to a private account of the customer, and that against that sum two cheques were drawn and paid. That is the whole account in dispute as raised by these pleadings. Therefore, there is certainly no such account as would induce a court of equity to maintain jurisdiction as if the question had turned entirely upon an account so I complicated, and so long, as to make it inconvenient to have it taken at law.
It has been attempted to support this bill upon other grounds, and one ground is that the relative situation of the appellant and the respondents would give a court of equity jurisdiction, independently of the length or the complexity of the accounts. Although it is not disputed that the transactions between the parties gave the legal right, it is said a court of equity, nevertheless, has concurrent jurisdiction, and that is attempted to be supported upon the supposed fiduciary character existing between the banker and his customer.

A No case has been produced in which that character has been given to the relation of banker and customer, but it has been attempted to be supported by reference to other cases supposed to be analogous. These are cases where bills have been filed as between principal and agent, or between principal and factor. As between principal and factor, there is no question whatever that that description of case which alone has been referred to in the argument in support of the jurisdiction

B has always been held to be within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, because the party partakes of the character of a trustee. Partaking of the character of a trustee, the factor—as the trustee for the particular matter in which he is employed as factor—sells the principal's goods, and accounts to him for the money. The goods, however, remain the goods of the owner or principal until the sale takes place, and the moment the money is received the money becomes the property

C of the principal. So it is with regard to an agent dealing with any property. He obtains no interest himself in the subject-matter beyond his remuneration; he is dealing throughout for another, and though he is not a trustee according to the strict technical meaning of the word, he is quasi a trustee for that particular transaction for which he is engaged. Therefore, in these cases the courts of equity have assumed jurisdiction.

D But the analogy entirely fails, as it appears to me, when you come to consider the relative situation of a banker and his customer, and for that purpose it is quite sufficient to refer to the authorities, which have been quoted, and to the nature of the connection between the parties. Money, when paid into a bank, ceases altogether to be the money of the customer; it is then the money of the banker, who is bound to return an equivalent by paying a similar sum to that

E deposited with him when he is asked for it. The money paid into the banker's is money known by the customer to be placed there for the purpose of being under the control of the banker. It is then the banker's money; he is known to deal with it as his own; he makes what profit of it he can, which profit he retains to himself, paying back only the principal, according to the custom of bankers in some places, or the principal and a small rate of interest, according to the custom of

F bankers in other places. The money placed in the custody of a banker is to all intents and purposes the money of the banker, to do with it as he pleases. He is guilty of no breach of trust in employing it; he is not answerable to the customer if he puts it into jeopardy, if he engages in a hazardous speculation; he is not bound to keep it or deal with it as the property of the customer, but he is, of course, answerable for the amount, because he has contracted, having received that money,

G to repay to the customer, when demanded, a sum equivalent to that paid into his hands. That has been the subject of discussion in various cases, and that has been established to be the relative situation of banker and customer. That being established to be the relative situations of banker and customer, the banker is not an agent or factor, but he is a debtor. Then the analogy between that case and those that have been referred to entirely fails, and the ground upon which those cases

H have, by analogy to the doctrine of trusteeship, been held to be the subject of the jurisdiction of a court of equity, has no application here, as it appears to me.

[His LORDSHIP dealt with the question whether under the law existing in 1848 the case came within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, and he added :]

I There is nothing in the relative situations of banker and customer which gives, per se, the right to sue in equity. That is proved, I apprehend, by the consideration of the question whether, if there had been no money drawn out at all and simply a sum of money had been deposited with the banker—I will not say deposited, but paid to the banker—on account of the customer, the customer could file a bill to get that money back again. The learned counsel judiciously avoided giving an answer to that question. But that tries the principle, because, if it is merely a sum of money paid to a factor or an agent, the party has a right to recall it. He has a right to deal with the factor or agent in his fiduciary character. But the banker does not hold that fiduciary character, and, therefore, there is no such original jurisdiction; and if there be no original jurisdiction growing out of the relative situations of the parties to see if the account is of such a nature that it cannot be taken at law. . . . The principle upon which my opinion is formed is that there is nothing to bring the demand within the precincts of a court of equity. Upon that ground I think the decree was right in dismissing the bill. A

LORD BROUGHAM.—My noble and learned friend, LORD LYNTHURST, who, from his right of precedence here, would naturally have addressed your Lordships before me—I, nevertheless, take leave, before he addresses your Lordships, to state my entire agreement in the reasons stated by my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, and in the opinion at which he has arrived through those reasons in favour of the decree of the court below. B

There is clearly no such account—whatever may be set forth by the bill—upon the facts of the present case which calls upon a court of equity, upon that head of jurisdiction, to give relief. . . . The account being excluded by the facts of this case, which show that there is no reason for this statement of account, there being but one sum paid in, and two sums of money drawn out, there is no reason for giving relief in equity. The question then comes to be, whether the appellant has succeeded on one or other of the two grounds, the first of which is, holding the banker to be in a quasi fiduciary position towards his customer and proceeding against him as if he were a trustee; and the other is whether the stipulation for interest by the banker makes any difference in the case? The latter question may be disposed of in a few words. It does not follow that because a banker contracts to pay any strictly legal demand, therefore that puts the case on a different footing. I should be very sorry if that should be so, because I am sure the Court of Chancery might have then a bill from every tradesman for payment of his account, for goods sold and delivered, and wherever there was a stipulation to pay after a certain time, as in many cases there is, in such a case a bill might be filed. But we know pretty well it is the ABC of the practice of a court of equity that no such bill can be filed. C D E

I come, then, to the only other ground, which was the main contention. As to the banker, is his position with respect to his customers that of a trustee with respect to his cestui que trust? Is it that of a principal with respect to an agent, or that of a principal with respect to a factor? I see no ground for contending that there is any identity in those two points. I am now speaking of the common position of a banker—the common case of his receiving money from his customer on condition of paying it back when asked for or when drawn upon, or of receiving money from other parties to the credit of the customer upon like conditions to be drawn out by the customer, or, in common parlance, the money being repaid when asked for, because the banker who receives the money has the use of it as his own, and in the using of it his trade consists, but for which no banker could exist, especially a banker who pays interest. Even a banker who does not pay interest could not possibly carry on his trade if he were to hold the money and to pay it back as a mere depository of the principal. But he receives it, to the knowledge of his customer for the express purpose of using it as his own, which, if he were a trustee, he could not do without a breach of trust. It is a totally different thing if we take into consideration certain acts which are often performed by a banker and put him in a totally different capacity. He may, in addition to his position of banker, make himself an agent or a trustee towards a cestui que trust. For example, suppose I deposit exchequer bills with a banker and he undertakes to receive the interest upon them, or to negotiate or sell them, and to credit my account with the proceeds of the sale, I do not stay to ask whether, in that case, he might not be in the position of a trustee, and might not partly sustain a fiduciary character, but he does that incidentally to his trade of a banker. His trade of a banker is totally independent of that, to it the other is an accidental addition. The trade of a banker is to receive money and use it as if it were his own, he becoming debtor to the person who has lent or deposited with him the money to use as his own, for which money he is accountable as a debtor. F G H I

A That being the trade of a banker, and that being the nature of the relation in which he stands to his customer, I cannot, without breaking down the bounds between equity and law, confound the situation of a banker with that of a trustee, and conclude that the banker is a debtor with a fiduciary character. I, therefore, entirely agree with my noble and learned friend, thinking that the view taken of this case in the court below was a correct one, and, therefore, I move that this
B appeal be dismissed, and the decree appealed from be affirmed, with costs.

LORD CAMPBELL.—I cannot help thinking that when this case was before KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C., the decree he pronounced must have proceeded upon some incorrect statement of the facts, and that he had thought that several actions would have been necessary. When you come to examine the facts, it is quite clear that
C this is a purely legal demand, the relation between banker and customer, as far as the pecuniary dealings are concerned, being that of debtor and creditor. It has been said that the banker is liable to do something more than merely to repay the money. He is bound to honour cheques, and perhaps to accept bills of exchange, if drawn upon him, he having assets in his hands, but these are purely matters of legal contract, and, it seems to me, that there is nothing of a fiduciary character at all in the relation subsisting between them. I think the noble and learned
D Lord, LORD LYNDHURST, was perfectly right in reversing the decree of the vice-chancellor, and that we shall do right in dismissing this appeal.

LORD LYNDHURST.—I entirely concur in the view that has been taken by my noble and learned friends, with respect to jurisdiction in matters of account. I am of opinion, therefore, with my noble and learned friends, that this judgment
E must be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

GREY AND OTHERS v. PEARSON AND OTHERS

G [HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Cranworth, L.C., Lord St. Leonards and Lord Wensleydale), March 5, 6, 9, 16, 1857]

3 Jur.N.S. 823; 5 W.R. 454; 10 E.R. 1216]

H Will—Statute—Document—Construction—Grammatical, natural and ordinary meaning to be given to words—Modification to avoid absurdity or inconsistency with rest of instrument—Consideration of will as a whole and surrounding circumstances—Giving effect to intention of testator.

I In construing wills, statutes and all written instruments, the grammatical, natural, and ordinary sense of the words is to be adhered to unless that would lead to some absurdity or some repugnance or inconsistency with the rest of the instrument, in which case the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words may be modified so as to avoid that absurdity or inconsistency, but no further.

A testator devised the estates H. and S. to trustees in trust for R.W. and the heirs of his body, but in case R.W. should die under twenty-one and without issue, then H. should be in trust for A.W. and the heirs of her body, and in case she should die under twenty-one and without issue, then H. should be on the same trusts are thereafter declared as to S.; and if R.W. should die under twenty-one and without issue, then S. should be for the testator's son and daughter-in-law A. and B., for their lives, and subject to the trusts thereinbefore declared for other persons. After the testator's death R.W. and A.W. both died without issue, but each attained twenty-one.

Held (LORD ST. LEONARDS dissenting): as the ordinary grammatical meaning of the words led to no absurdity or inconsistency, the devise over could not take effect, except on the double contingency of R.W. dying under twenty-one and without issue, which did not happen; and, therefore, there was an intestacy as to the H. estate.

Per LORD ST. LEONARDS: Nobody is more disposed than I am to abide by clear words and to give to them their natural and grammatical meaning, but I never did, and I never can, come to the conclusion that the words of a will will not admit of modification according to the real intention of the testator as you find it from other expressions or from the whole context of the will. It is difficult to lay down any abstract rule on the subject, but where I find words pointing out the intention, and that, if I give to the words their simple meaning according to grammar and according to their prima facie import, I defeat the intention, I hold that I am bound by every rule both of law and equity to see whether I cannot give to them by natural construction an import which will effectuate and not defeat the intention.

Per LORD WENSLEYDALE: In construing a will the only question is: What is the meaning of the words used in that writing? To ascertain that, every part of the will must be considered with the help of those surrounding circumstances which are admissible in evidence to explain the words and put the court as nearly as possible in the situation of the writer of the instrument. . . . In construing wills the events which might possibly have happened, as well as those which did happen, are to be considered.

Judgment—Judicial decision as authority—Decision on meaning of words in instrument—Value in construction of similar words in another instrument.

Per LORD WENSLEYDALE: We are bound by decided cases for the purpose of securing as much certainty in the administration of the law as the subject is capable of. But when the decision is not upon some rule or principle of law, but upon the meaning of words which differ so much in one instrument from those in another, and when the proper construction is so varied by the peculiar circumstances of each case, it seldom happens that the words of one will are a sure guide for the construction of words resembling them in another. Besides, the salutary rule of construction (that words in a document should be given their grammatical, natural and ordinary meaning) may have been misapplied in the particular cases, and then they are of no binding authority at all. When, by any course of decisions, words have acquired a particular signification it may be presumed that the framer of the instrument used them in the sense so acquired, and it is fitting so to construe them. But when there has been an instance or two only of the words being read in a different sense from that which they naturally bear, no such presumption can be made.

V.-C.

By his will Richard Watson, being possessed of the estate of Stainton and the estate of Hemlington, in Yorkshire, after making several provisions by way of annuity and legacy, gave those real estates to trustees in fee and directed :

“And subject to the trusts aforesaid, all the said premises hereinbefore devised E shall be in trust for my grandson Robert Watson and the heirs of his body; but in case he shall die under the age of twenty-one years and without issue, my said messuage or dwelling-house and farm at Hemlington aforesaid, and my said six messuages or cottages at Stainton aforesaid (subject to the trust herein-before thereof respectively declared) shall be in trust for my said granddaughter F Ann Watson and the heirs of her body, but in case she shall die under the age of twenty-one years and without issue, the said last-mentioned premises shall be upon such and the same trusts as are hereinafter declared concerning my said messuage or dwelling-house and farm at Stainton aforesaid. And I declare and direct that if my said grandson Robert Watson shall die under the age of twenty-one years, and without issue, then and in that case the said Robert Watson Darnell and Watson Chapman, their heirs and assigns, shall stand and be seised of my said messuage or dwelling-house at Stainton aforesaid, now in my own occupation, and the said farm at Stainton aforesaid, now in the occupation of the said John Sherwood, upon the trusts following (that is to say), in trust to pay the rents issues and profits of the same premises to or for the use of my son Richard Watson, for and during his natural life, at the same times and in like manner, and subject to such restrictions as are hereinafter mentioned with regard to an annuity to him of £60, and from and after his decease or other sooner determination of his life-interest therein, in trust, to pay the same rents, issues and profits unto my daughter-in-law Mary Watson during her life, if she shall so long continue the widow of the said Richard Watson. And subject to the trusts hereinbefore thereof declared, the said messuage and farm at Stainton aforesaid shall be in trust for my grandson Wm. Darnell and the said Robert Watson Darnell, and my granddaughter Elizabeth Darnell, in equal shares.” I

When the testator died, he left his grandson Robert Watson, who afterwards attained the age of twenty-one years and died without issue. His granddaughter Anne Watson also attained twenty-one and died without issue. A bill was filed by the trustees seeking the direction of the court as to how the trusts under the will were properly to be executed. TURNER, V.-C., held that the two persons named tenants in tail, the grandson Robert Watson and the granddaughter Anne Watson, having both died without issue of their body, the ultimate trust in favour of W.,

- A R.W., and E. Darnell took effect, viz., the trust under "and subject to the trusts hereinbefore thereof declared, the said messuage and farm at Stainton aforesaid, shall be in trust for my grandson William Darnell," and so on, and that, therefore, the Darnells were entitled. From that decree there was an appeal to the Lord Chancellor, who was of opinion that the decree was partly right and partly wrong—i.e., as to the Stainton estate it was right, but that as to the Hemlington estate it was wrong; and he made a decree varying the former decree as to the Hemlington estate. With respect to the Stainton estate, there was no complaint of his decree, but with respect to the Hemlington estate the present appeal was brought.

Feb. 16, 1857. LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—The question as to the Hemlington estate turns upon this. Subject to certain trusts for raising legacies and annuities, the trustees were to stand possessed of the estate upon those trusts,

- D "and subject to the trusts aforesaid, all the said premises hereinbefore devised shall be in trust for my grandson Robert Watson and the heirs of his body; but in case he shall die under the age of twenty-one years and without issue," then to Anne in like manner. Robert Watson died without issue of his body, but he did not die under the age of twenty-one years. The real and important question is, there being that condition, if he should "die under the age of twenty-one years and without issue," whether that "and" is to be read according to its natural

- E import, so as not to give the estate over unless he died both without issue and under the age of twenty-one years, or whether, he having died without issue, the trust over was to take effect, rejecting, as it were, the words "under the age of twenty-one years." Supposing this case had been unaffected by prior decisions, I conceive there could have been no doubt upon the subject, because the rule of construction which, in modern times more particularly, the courts have been
- F anxiously inclined to follow has been to adhere as rigidly as possible to the precise words that are found, whether in wills or in deeds, and to give to those words their natural and ordinary meaning, unless by so doing it appears from the context that you are using them in a different sense from that which the testator or the maker of the deed intended to use them, or unless by so using them you would be doing something which would manifestly tend to an inconsistency which could not have
- G been the intention of the party making the instrument. Applying that rule to the present case, supposing it to be untouched by decisions, the question is, whether in construing that word "and" copulatively in its natural sense, you are doing anything which is either inconsistent with what else appears upon the face of the will, or are doing something which manifestly must be going contrary to the real objects of the testator. I confess I can see no ground whatever for thinking that

- H the word "and" was not what the testator intended, for he gives the estates to his grandson Robert Watson and the heirs of his body. That gives him an estate tail, and all persons familiar with the subject know, and probably this testator knew, that when his grandson attained twenty-one, he would have the absolute power of disposing of the property just as he might think fit, because a century has elapsed since it was settled that a tenant in tail has in truth the absolute control over the
- I property. He may, by suffering a recovery, or without suffering recovery by doing something analogous to it, make himself absolute owner of the property. When you give an estate to a tenant in tail in that way, it makes him substantially the absolute owner of the property. But the testator declares that, if the grandson dies under the age of twenty-one years and without issue, it shall go over. It appears to me that that was not an irrational mode of disposing of the property. Therefore, I should feel at a loss—indeed I should feel it impossible—to hold that that could not be what the testator intended. So, independently of authority, I should have felt myself bound to adhere to the strict meaning of the words, and to say that the testator, having given the estate over in the event of his grandson dying "under twenty-one and without issue," inasmuch as he died over twenty-one but without issue, there was no gift over. A

Then the question arises whether this mode of construing the will has been affected by previous authorities, because there is another rule of construction which is quite reasonable—that where words have for a long series of years had a well-known technical construction, although it might not be that construction which, if the case were untouched by decisions, the court might now arrive at, yet it would be unsafe, and render property insecure, if we were to depart from that construction. B
The cases which, by way of analogy, were mainly relied upon as authorities, were cases of which there is a great number in the books, beginning at one reported in the reign of Queen Elizabeth I, and found in CROKE'S REPORTS (Soulle v. Gerrard (1)) I say, beginning with that case, for I am not clear that there may not have been prior cases; but, beginning there, the same doctrine is carried down through a variety of cases, and was ultimately approved of and sanctioned by your Lordships' House in a well-known case in the early part of this century, Fairfield v. Morgan (2), which arose on a writ of error from Ireland. C

In that case the doctrine was enunciated and approved that when a testator devises an estate so as to give the control of the fee-simple to his son, or to any person, but if he dies under the age of twenty-one years or without issue, then over—in that case "or" must there have been meant, though it is improperly used, to have been used conjunctively and not disjunctively, because it never could have been the testator's intention in giving an estate to a person and his heirs to give it away from his issue, if he should happen to die under twenty-one leaving issue. I confess that, if that were now to be decided for the first time, I should rather have doubts even upon that case, whether it was not more likely to be the safe rule to adhere to the strict meaning of the words used, than to speculate upon what the testator intended. However, I only throw that out, not as meaning to cast any doubt upon the rule that where those words do occur they must be prima facie at least so understood—that is to say, if an estate is given to a person and his heirs with a limitation over in case he dies "under twenty-one or without issue," then in that case, if he dies under twenty-one leaving issue, it is meant that the issue should take, and if he attains twenty-one and does not have issue, still it can only be an estate tail. That has been the construction adopted for the purpose of preserving the estate to the issue, which otherwise would be defeated. The ground of that, as I have already pointed out, is that any other construction would defeat that which must be presumed to have been the intention of the testator, and that when he gave the estate to a person and his heirs, or in a way which amounts to giving to a person and his heirs, that construction must be wrong, which, if the person died leaving issue, would take it away from that issue. To depart from that long-established rule, and to adopt a stricter rule of construction, would probably cause more evil than it would remedy, as was very ably pointed out by LORD BROUGHAM, when he held the Great Seal, in Malcolm v. Taylor (3) (2 Russ. & M. at p. 447). F

The question, therefore, which your Lordships have to consider is whether there is any such well-recognised technical rule which applies to a case like the present, where the devise is not to a person and his heirs with a limitation over if he dies under twenty-one or without issue, but where a testator gives an estate tail to a person and the heirs of his body, with a limitation over if he dies under twenty-one and without issue. Is there any rule of construction which says that, in that case, it is to go over if he does not fulfil both conditions—that is to say, if he does not die under twenty-one and without issue, that it is to go over if he dies at any time without issue? G H

In support of that proposition great reliance was placed upon the well-known case of Brownsword v. Edwards (4), a case of very high authority which was decided by LORD HARDWICKE, L.C. In that case there was a devise to trustees in fee upon trust to receive the rents till John Brownsword should attain the age of twenty-one or have issue, and then the testator devised the estate to John Brownsword and the I

A heirs of his body, but, if he should die under twenty-one and without issue, then to Sarah Brownsword. John Brownsword attained the age of twenty-one, but afterwards died without issue. LORD HARDWICKE held that the remainder over to Sarah Brownsword took effect. That case has often been cited, and certainly quite erroneously cited, as an authority for the proposition that LORD HARDWICKE held that the word "and" was to be read as "or." That is clearly not the ground upon which LORD HARDWICKE proceeded, as is manifest from his own language. What LORD HARDWICKE proceeded upon, whether correctly or not, was this. He said:

"This is an alternative gift: if John Brownsword attains twenty-one or has issue, it is a gift to him and the heirs of his body; and, as an alternative, if he dies under twenty-one and without issue, there is a gift to Sarah Brownsword."

C He did not fulfil that condition; he did not die under twenty-one, though he died without issue. LORD HARDWICKE held, nevertheless, that by implication the gift was to go over to Sarah Brownsword in any event if he died without issue. But that was not by altering "and" into "or." For unquestionably LORD HARDWICKE never would have held that, if he died under twenty-one leaving issue, it was to go away from his issue. That never could have been his meaning, because it was an express devise to him and the heirs of his body. To make it quite clear that LORD HARDWICKE did not proceed upon that ground, I will read what he says. Speaking of those cases in which "or" has been held to mean "and," he says (2 Ves. Sen. at p. 249):

E "If the first limitation had been in tail there would be no occasion to resort to that [the alteration of the word], but the court would have made the construction I do now, viz., if he dies without issue before twenty-one, then over by way of executory devise; if he dies without issue after twenty-one, when the estate had vested in him, it would go by way of remainder, because he had made his original devise capable of a proper remainder, in which case the court will always construe it a remainder."

I do not know that it is necessary for me absolutely to say that I think that LORD HARDWICKE is not in that case rightly deciding. I confess, however, that if I were bound to express an opinion on the subject, I should be obliged to say that I do not think that is a decision founded upon correct principles. Because, unquestionably, there LORD HARDWICKE, though he does not change the word "and" into "or," which would not have answered his view at all, does imply that there was an intention to give a remainder in case the estate tail in the son John took effect, whereas there are no words that express such a meaning. In the present case, however, that principle cannot apply, because here the words are clearly sufficient to give an absolute estate tail in the first instance, which was not the case in Brownsword v. Edwards (4). In Brownsword v. Edwards (4) it may be said that in the expression "if he dies under twenty-one and without issue," the words "under twenty-one" were not unnaturally introduced—though perhaps unnecessarily, still not unnaturally—because the object was to provide for a contingency exactly the opposite of that which LORD HARDWICKE points to, that is to say, if he died under twenty-one and without issue there is the alternative of either attaining twenty-one or having issue. But in the present case the words found in this will "if he dies under the age of twenty-one years, and without issue," are absolutely meaningless, unless full effect is to be given to the word "and," after the expression "if he dies under twenty-one." The argument is that it is to be read as if he died without issue, whether under the age of twenty-one years or after the age of twenty-one years. So that the words "under twenty-one years," it is contended, have no meaning at all. Not being called upon to say whether upon the grounds pointed out by LORD HARDWICKE Brownsword v. Edwards (4) was or was not rightly decided, I conceive that either it was not rightly decided, or, that if rightly decided, it was so decided upon principles not governing the present case.

Whether I should have felt myself warranted in adopting such a construction, if Brownsword v. Edwards (4) had been entirely unshaken, is a matter upon which I need not speculate, because I conceive that the precise view which I take of the law upon this subject was discussed in Doe d. Usher v. Jessep (5), in the Court of Queen's Bench in 1810, when LORD ELLENBOROUGH presided in that court. I confess that to my mind, and indeed it was pretty well admitted at the Bar, that the present case is undistinguishable from Doe d. Usher v. Jessep (5). There was a devise to trustees in fee "in trust to and for my natural son John," "whom I had by" such and such a woman, "and the heirs of his body lawfully issuing for ever." It was a gift in tail in the first instance, "and my will further is, that, if the said John Jessep shall happen to die before he attains his age of twenty-one years, and without issue lawfully to be begotten, then I devise" the property over to certain persons, who were the claimants. The question was whether the persons claiming upon that gift over were entitled, the facts being, as in this case, that John Jessep had attained twenty-one but never had any issue. When the case came before the court, Brownsword v. Edwards (4) having been pressed as being directly in point, LORD ELLENBOROUGH says (12 East, at p. 293):

"The cases certainly run very near, the only distinction seems to be that the limitation in Brownsword v. Edwards (4) was in favour of a daughter who, without such a construction as was there put on the word, would have been left without any provision, and here the limitation over is to other relatives."

I think it is better not to make such nice distinctions in one's own mind in order to save the necessity of saying that you go against a prior decision, because really the distinction only comes to this, that in one case it was a gift over to collaterals, and in the other to nearer relations. That appears to me a distinction that one cannot understand. LORD ELLENBOROUGH goes on to say, having remarked that the cases do run very close:

"But is there not a rule of common sense as strong as any case can be, that words in a will are to be construed according to their natural sense, unless some obvious inconvenience or incongruity would result from so construing them? Now here the testator has used the copulative word 'and,' and has devised this estate over in case his son die before twenty-one 'and' without issue, that is, if both those events happened; why then should we read 'and' as 'or,' and give the estate over upon the happening of one only of the events, when no inconvenience will ensue by construing the word used in its natural sense?"

That was the decision of the court.

That case was decided in 1810, just sixty years after Brownsword v. Edwards (4) had been decided. Whether that case is now entirely unquestioned, I do not stop to inquire. As far as I have been able to discover, it has not been seriously questioned. It has been in force for between forty and fifty years. When the present case came before me by way of appeal, it appeared to me that either Doe d. Usher v. Jessep (5) overruled Brownsword v. Edwards (4) or that, if it did not overrule it, it is by reason of there being some distinction, which same distinction exists in the present case. I thought the rule laid down in Doe d. Usher v. Jessep (5) a more sensible and convenient rule than that in Brownsword v. Edwards (4) and I acted upon it. I confess, though I have considered the case in every point of view, and have looked to see how far subsequent authorities have at all shaken this decision, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the decision at which I arrived is the safe and correct conclusion.

There was one case which had been decided when the present case was argued before me, bearing some relation to it, but it was not quoted in the argument before me, and I dare say the counsel were not aware of it. On looking, however, at that case, I confess, so far from leading me to doubt the propriety of my decision, it rather confirms me. I allude to Mortimer v. Hartley (6), in the Exchequer. In that case there was some doubt as to what estate was meant to be given to the son John and the daughter Ann, but it was held that by the construction estates tail were given, and then it was said:

A "If it shall please God to take away both John and Ann under age [i.e., under the age of 25 years], or without issue, then to Joseph Westerman."

B John, to whom the previous estate tail had been given, attained the age of twenty-five, and then died without issue. He had had issue, but the issue died during his life. It was held that the devisee over was entitled, that the word "or" must have its natural meaning. The estate was given to John and the heirs of his body, and if he died under twenty-five or without issue, to Joseph Westerman. The contention there was that "or" was to be altered into "and," and that inasmuch as he had attained twenty-five, there was no gift over to Joseph Westerman. The Court of Exchequer, after a very elaborate argument, and fully considering the case, were of opinion that the natural meaning was to be given to the word "or," and that the rule as to construing "or" as meaning "and," could not hold universally. The C testator having said, "I give the estate to John and the heirs of his body, but if he dies under twenty-five or without issue, it is to be given over," and he having died without issue, the court held that the gift over was, therefore, to take effect. I confess I do not see that that case would have shaken me in the opinion I have formed. I confess it does not at all—on the other hand, it rather appears to me to confirm the view I have taken, as showing that the ordinary meaning of words is, if possible, D to be adhered to.

It remains only to advert to another argument. TURNER, V.-C., was of opinion that, quacunq̃ue via data, this estate was to go over to the ultimate devisees, for that there was as to the estate of Stainton a direction that, in case the grandson died under the age of twenty-one years, there was to be a life-interest given to his E parents which never took effect, because that life-interest expired in the lifetime of the grandson. There was then a direction given, "and subject to the trust hereinbefore thereof declared, the said messuage and farm at Stainton aforesaid shall be in trust for" the Darnells, the persons litigating the case. In the devise of Hemlington there was a declaration that, if Robert the grandson died under twenty-one and without issue, it was to go to Ann and the heirs of her body, but that in case F she should die under twenty-one and without issue, then the same trusts as were declared as to Stainton should take effect as to Hemlington. TURNER, V.-C., thought that that carried the Hemlington estate as well as the Stainton estate. I had occasion to consider this point when the case came before me on appeal from his decision, and I have considered it since, but I cannot see how that ultimate limitation as to Stainton can by any possibility be applicable. The limitations as to G Stainton are only to be applied to Hemlington in case Robert and Ann both die under the age of twenty-one years, and without issue. In neither of these two cases did the contingency as to dying under twenty-one happen, and, therefore, the same principle which induces me to say that there was no gift over after the death of Robert Watson when he attained the age of twenty-one, induces me also to say that there is no declaration in the will, that the ultimate trusts of Stainton shall be applicable to Hemlington. For these reasons it is my duty to move your Lordships H that the judgment below be affirmed.

LORD ST. LEONARDS read the following opinion.—I have the misfortune to differ from my noble and learned friend who has just spoken, and from my noble and learned friend, LORD WENSLEYDALE, and as I thought it necessary, in order to be precise, to write what my opinion was in this case, I shall now take the liberty I of reading what I wrote.

The legal fee-simple in this case is given to the trustees upon the trusts afterwards declared of the same. Upon the whole of the will I have arrived at the conclusion that the testator intended to dispose of the equitable fee-simple, and did not die intestate as to any portion of it. There is no residuary devise, unless the declarations of trust, to which I shall presently refer, operate in effect as such. Looking at the provisions in the will, I am satisfied that the testator never intended, in an event not unlikely to happen soon after his own death, viz., the death of his grandson Robert, after attaining twenty-one without issue, to allow his estate to descend to his son in fee. If the will is open to that construction, it must be that the expressions which he has used fail to give effect to his intention. The first trust is (subject to the directions to raise annuities and a contingent legacy) for his grandson Robert Watson and the heirs of his body, an equitable estate tail by apt words of limitation. But in case he shall die under twenty-one and without issue, then a part of the estate is to be in trust for his granddaughter Ann Watson (Robert's sister) and the heirs of her body. And in case she should die under twenty-one and without issue, over. And the testator directs the trustees out of the rents to raise during the infancy of his grandchildren respectively such maintenance money for them as the trustees should think fit. A B

To stop here. Robert died without issue, but attained twenty-one, so that he did not die under twenty-one and without issue. Did then the devise over to Ann take effect? The devise of the equitable estate was clearly to Robert in tail, and no construction can be put upon the devise which would narrow or restrict his estate tail. No one can take under the will until that estate tail is exhausted by Robert's failure of issue, whenever that might happen, without reference to the period of his death. So that the construction of the gift over is wholly immaterial to Robert and his issue. It is only material as between the granddaughter Ann and the heir-at-law of the testator, Ann's father. If the first devise had been to Robert in fee, it is clear not only that the word "and" could not be read "or," but that if the disjunctive conjunction had been used by the testator, the conjunctive one would have been introduced in its stead, because the testator could not be understood to mean to give the estate over from his first devisee's children in the event of such devisee dying under twenty-one, leaving children, and they might not be entitled, if the estate went over in consequence of his dying under twenty-one without regard to his leaving issue behind him. In such cases, therefore the court does more than reject a word, for it substitutes one word for another, and indeed one that is directly opposed in its import to the one which is rejected. It is owing to the infirmity of our language, that we have no word to express in a combined sense the two conjunctions "or" and "and." In devises where the first taker, although confined by the testator in words to a life-estate, has been held to take an estate tail under a subsequent gift to the heirs of his body, the courts have disregarded words annexed to the words "heirs of the body," such as that they were to take as tenants in common, in favour of the general intention. Upon the whole will the paramount intent is regarded, and directions contrary to that view are in effect struck out of the will. So when the testator's intention is clear, but he fails in words to provide for the precise event which happens, the courts supply the words. For example, on a gift to a woman during her life, if she shall so long continue his widow, and, in case she marry, to A. in fee, he will take upon either the death or marriage of the widow. C D E F G

In Newburgh v. Newburgh (7) in introducing gifts over in a will by an enumeration of the estates, the estate in one country was by mistake struck out by the conveyancer in settling the draft, and an attempt was made, but failed, to be allowed to prove the mistake by parol evidence, and to have it corrected. When the case reached this House, it was ultimately decided that the clause in which the county was omitted might be rejected, or the missing county be considered as inserted in it, so as to give all the estates over to the countess for life, upon the evidence furnished by the context of the will of the intention of the testator. Where the expression is in a gift over in case of a death "without being married," it has in favour of the intention been construed "without ever having been married": Bell v. Phyn (8). I will not multiply the instances in which words have been rejected, or altered, or supplied in a will, in order to give effect to the clear intention. But, as a general rule, words should be received in their natural grammatical import, and effect given if possible to every word in the will. H I

In the present case the primary intention of the testator was to give an estate tail to Robert, and I hold that we are not at liberty to cut down or affect that gift in any way. This at once removes the difficulty where the first devisee is to take the fee. The gift over is in case he dies under twenty-one and without issue. It is

A agreed that you cannot simply read "or" for "and," for if you did, and Robert died under twenty-one leaving issue, such issue could not take, and that would defeat the declared intent of the testator. It is argued that you must provide for the naked case of his dying under twenty-one, for you cannot reject those words as surplusage or add to them. You may not, it is urged, read them as a gift over if he die under twenty-one without issue. In my opinion, the testator intended what he has already expressed, that his son should take an estate tail, and I think that he meant, what is not so clearly expressed, that the estate should go over if his son died at any time without issue. The reason why the age of twenty-one was introduced was, I think, because he did not intend the son to take the estate itself, that is, to enter into the enjoyment of it, until he attained twenty-one, for the legal estate was in the trustees, and they are to supply maintenance for the son while under twenty-one out of the rents. He, therefore, intended to give the estate over in case his son never, in this view, became entitled to it, viz., if he died under twenty-one, but still, not unless there was a failure of issue. And he also intended it to go over if his son did attain twenty-one and enter upon the enjoyment of the estate, but should afterwards die without issue; and I think that we are enabled by the rules of law to give effect to that intention.

D The first case cited at the Bar, Soulle v. Gerrard (1), was decided, when executory devises were not allowed—a fee could not be engrafted upon a fee—but still the case is instructive as to the way in which we are at liberty to deal with the case before us. The devise was to the testator's son Richard, in fee, and if he died within the age of twenty-one or without issue, then the land should be equally divided among the testator's other sons. Richard died within age, leaving issue.

E ANDERSON, C.J., said, that, if the limitation had been single, viz., if he died without issue, etc., it was an estate tail and explained the former limitation, and he conceived that this part of the limitation "if he die within age" was utterly void, for a remainder could not depend upon a fee, and then it was all one as if the limitation had been single if he die without issue; so Richard had an estate tail. WALMSLEY, J., agreed, and he added that if the remainder might pass upon his dying within age, yet it could not be until he died without issue also, for, the words being "if he died within age or died without issue, then," etc. This "then," which shows the beginning of the remainder, shall be when he dies without issue, and not before, so that it is all one as if the disjunctive "or" had been a copulative. BEAUMONT and OWEN, JJ., agreed, and the latter added that if the remainder might commence upon the first limitation, yet it ought not to commence by the words and intent until the other part be performed also, viz., that the devisee died without issue. This is an important authority, for, although it would be decided differently now, because executory devises within due limits are valid, yet it shows that where the first devise is expressly or by implication a devise in tail, a gift over in case the devisee die under twenty-one or without issue may be read without alteration, and yet a death under twenty-one will not carry the estate over unless also there is a failure of issue. If necessary to this construction the words "if he die under twenty-one" may be rejected; and still further, that "or" may be read "and," and yet the estate will go over if the first devisee die under age leaving issue.

H Woodward v. Glasbrook (9) is also an authority bearing on this case. The devise was to the testator's children as tenants in common in tail, and if any of them should die before twenty-one or unmarried, his part should go over to the survivors.

I HOLT, C.J., held that one dying unmarried, though he attained the age of twenty-one, his share went over. If the death had been under twenty-one, but the devisee had married, the estate, I apprehend, would not have gone over so as to defeat any issue of the devisee tenant in tail. So HOLT, C.J., appears to have held that the words "shall die before twenty-one" were immaterial, and the estate would go over whenever the devisee died unmarried.

This brings me to Brownsword v. Edwards (4), which was so much discussed at the Bar. I must, without reserve, say that I consider it a binding authority; and I entirely subscribe to LORD HARDWICKE's doctrine in it. I cannot, upon any sound ground, distinguish it from the case now before the House. The estate was devised to trustees and their heirs to receive the rents until John Brownsword should attain twenty-one in trust to place them out to improve the estate, and if he should live to attain twenty-one, or have issue, then to him and the heirs of his body, but if he should happen to die before twenty-one, and without issue, then a like gift to a female child, etc., and over just in the same way. The children were considered to be the testator's legitimate offspring. John attained twenty-one, and died without issue.

It was said that this case differs from the one under appeal, inasmuch as the former was a gift upon a contingency, while in this case an estate tail is at once given. But if that difference has any weight, I think that it is in favour of the appellant. LORD HARDWICKE relied upon the gift being in tail, and upon the plain intention of the testator to give it over, and not to let in the testator's right heirs. He held that John took an estate tail when he attained twenty-one, and that he would have done so had he had issue, though he had died before twenty-one. The construction was to give him an estate tail in either event. As to the subsequent words, in the construction of wills the court has construed the words conformably to the intent of the testator as much as possible, ranging them in a different order, and transposing them to comply therewith. But in this case there was no such necessity (this is what LORD HARDWICKE said), for there was a plain natural construction upon these words, viz., if John shall happen to die before twenty-one and also shall happen to die without issue, which construction plainly makes the dying without issue to go through the whole, and fully answers the intent in that manner. LORD HARDWICKE added that an estate tail is capable of a remainder, and it is natural to expect a remainder after it. It appears, therefore, that, in a case I think more difficult to manage than this, LORD HARDWICKE, after "an estate tail," read the words "if John should happen to die before the age of twenty-one years and without issue," thus, "if John should happen to die before twenty-one, and [also should happen to die] without issue." This effected the intention of the testator, by plainly construing the words "dying without issue," to go through the whole sentence. This construction I am prepared to adopt and to apply to this case. LORD HARDWICKE did not convert "and" into "or," although that may be done in favour of the intention, just as "or" may be read "and" where the intention requires it: Bell v. Phyn (8). It is said that the construction in Brownsword v. Edwards (4) gave no effect to the words "die under twenty-one." But full effect was given to them by reading them as connected with the subsequent words "without issue," and it is no objection that by this construction the words give no additional force to the devise, for the construction does, taking the words altogether and giving full effect to them all, effectuate the clear intention of the testator.

The later case of Doe d. Usher v. Jessep (5), may be considered as similar to the one before the House, and the Court of King's Bench, not in words overruling the well-considered case of Brownsword v. Edwards (4) decided in direct opposition to the principle upon which it was determined that "and" was to receive its natural construction, and, therefore, that, although the first devise was to an infant in tail, yet the gift over, if he should happen to die under twenty-one and without issue, required both events to happen, and the devise over was held to fail, as the first devisee attained twenty-one although he died without issue. My noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor considered that he had to elect between LORD HARDWICKE's decision and the later decision of the Court of King's Bench, and he felt himself bound by the later decision. The cases were well calculated to embarrass the court. But now that the case has been more fully considered, I think that your Lordships will be inclined to support the earlier authority. Doe d. Usher v. Jessep (5) was hastily decided, and not well considered. Independently of what must occur to every one who reads it, which has been pointed out by my noble and learned friend, that the distinction there drawn by LORD ELLENBOROUGH is one that cannot be maintained for a moment—I say, independently of that, the court actually decided this important point of law without hearing both sides, and their reasons show

A that they did not accurately distinguish between cases where the first devise was in fee and the case before them where the devise was in tail. This is proved by what fell from two of the learned judges during the argument. In delivering judgment the Chief Justice thought that inconvenience would ensue by construing the word "and" in its natural sense, so that he considered it unimportant that the gifts over were all destroyed by this construction. LE BLANC, J., said that the case was so far distinguished from Brownsword v. Edwards (4) that there the word "and" was construed "or" (which we have seen was not the case) to prevent the working of an injury to the issue: here "and" is required to be construed "or," in order to work the very injury, to avoid which in other cases the courts have construed "or" to be "and." Reading it in the natural sense of the word, the son having attained twenty-one, the limitation over, which was only to take effect if he died before

C twenty-one and without issue, was defeated. BAYLEY, J., added:

"If the son had died under twenty-one leaving issue, the construction contended for by the plaintiff's counsel would leave the testator intestate as to such issue, which was clearly against his intention."

D These observations prove that the real nature of the case was misunderstood, for, as the first devisee took an estate tail, and not an estate in fee, the construction adopted by LORD HARDWICKE would not have defeated the issue in any case which could happen. I submit, therefore, to your Lordships that Doe d. Usher v. Jessep (5) cannot be relied on as an authority.

E It so happened, when the case now before the House was heard upon appeal in the court below, that the authority of Brownsword v. Edwards (4) had recently come before the Court of Exchequer in Mortimer v. Hariley (6), and in an elaborate written judgment, delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD WENSLEYDALE, Brownsword v. Edwards (4) was recognised as a clear binding authority, and Doe d. Usher v. Jessep (5), which had been relied upon in the argument, was manifestly passed over as of no weight. It unfortunately happened that this case was not referred to before my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, and

F he had not, therefore, the benefit of the opinion of the Court of Exchequer. In the case in the Exchequer, after successive estates tail to a son and daughter, the testator declared that if both of them should die under twenty-five or without leaving lawful issue, he gave the estate to his brother in fee. The second devisee in tail died an infant, and without having been married. The first devisee in tail attained twenty-five and died without issue. The Court of Exchequer relied upon

G the first gift being in tail, and, acknowledging Brownsword v. Edwards (4) as a binding authority, they followed it strictly and read the words as they found them, because by that construction in the event which happened the estate would go over to the brother according to the testator's intention. But they observed that if in the case before them any change in the language should be made, the one which would be most likely to effectuate the intent of the testator would be to read the words as

H if they had been, "and if John and Ann should die under age or at any time without issue." By so reading them the issue would take if their parents died under twenty-five, and the brother would succeed on the determination of the estate tail. But if this could not be done they thought they should make no change at all. They did not, therefore, as the event did not require it, construe the words as embracing every event without varying them, but they clearly intimated that they would have fully

I followed out the decision of LORD HARDWICKE if the circumstances had required it.

I need not say that I now entertain great doubt how the decision would have been, because my noble and learned friend, LORD WENSLEYDALE, now thinks that the present case below was rightly decided. He, of course, could not have been aware of the construction which I have now put upon the judgment which was delivered by him in the Court of Exchequer. As I understand, the ground upon which this appeal is now to be dismissed is one that really goes back to Fairfield v. Morgan (2). LORD WENSLEYDALE, as I understand him—of course not overruling it—because it is impossible to do so (it is the established law of the country, and we have not the power to overrule it)—but giving an opinion that, if that case were now to be decided, he should be inclined to come to a different decision, and relying simply upon the words of the devise, not to give effect to the gift over in a case very likely to happen, and which nobody denies that the testator intended to provide for. That would bring us back to a rule of law which I believe, as I understand the law at present, does not exist. Nobody is more disposed than I am to abide by clear words, and to give them their natural and grammatical meaning, but I never did, and I never can, come to the conclusion that the words of a will will not admit of modification according to the real intention of the testator as you find it from other expressions or from the whole context of the will. It is difficult to lay down any abstract rule upon the subject, but where I find words pointing out the intention, and that, if I give to the words their simple meaning according to grammar and according to their prima facie import, I defeat the intention, I hold that I am bound by every rule both of law and equity to see whether I cannot give to them by natural construction an import which will effectuate and not defeat the intention.

Take Fairfield v. Morgan (2). There one word is substituted for another, and the word substituted is directly opposite in meaning to the one for which it is substituted; that is the law of this country, decided in this House, which has been followed ever since, and no one doubts it. There, so far from giving the words their natural meaning, you feel yourself at liberty to change the words. The testator has expressed what he meant in case two events shall happen, using the copulative conjunction and instead of the disjunctive or. You say he could not mean that. He has given an estate in fee, and that estate would go over if the party died under twenty-one, unless you alter the word. Then you take the liberty of altering the word by introducing another word in order to effect that which this House, as a judicial tribunal, is bound to do, in order to effect the intention of the testator. It appears to me, therefore, that the decision in the present case will go very far—I will not say to overrule Fairfield v. Morgan (2), because it cannot be overruled—but to shake the principle of it. It will lead simply to looking at the words superficially in order to ask: What do the words mean?—we will abide by the words, and take them as we find them. That would, no doubt, avoid a great many difficulties, but I confess I do not think that that is a rule by which we, as a judicial tribunal, should be guided.

I can only say, therefore, with great respect for my noble and learned friend, that I entertain as clear an opinion as I ever did in any case that, according to the true construction of the rule of law as applied to this case, the gift over is a perfectly good one, and that it falls directly within the authority of Brownsword v. Edwards (4). And I never can press too much upon your Lordships' attention that the whole depends upon the first gift being in tail—not being in fee—and that, therefore, we are at liberty, without affecting in any manner the estate given to the first devisee in tail, to read the words introducing the gift over without violence at all. By a natural, and I think an easy construction, adopting the rule laid down by Lord Hardwicke, we are at liberty to give effect to the gift over. That case, upon that very elaborate judgment, was for many years considered an authority.

With regard to Doe d. Usher v. Jessep (5), we cannot read without respect the names of the very learned persons by whom that case was decided; but, seeing the way in which it was decided, and the evidently mistaken reasons that were given for the decision, I cannot think that that is an authority which can overrule the well-considered case of Brownsword v. Edwards (4); and, although it is true, as my noble and learned friend has remarked, that Doe d. Usher v. Jessep (5) has been decided a good many years, I would observe that Brownsword v. Edwards (4) was decided a good many years before that, and I have no hesitation in saying that it appears to me a decision that is entitled to much greater weight as an authority.

Then, my Lords, considering, as I must consider, the matter in the way I have submitted it to your Lordships, which I have done in justification of the opinion which I entertain and in order, so far as any statements of the opinion which I really

A entertain can go, that the law may be kept as far as may be within the course in which it has usually flowed, I come to the second question, and upon that I have an equally clear opinion, unfortunately differing also from that of my noble and learned friends. I did not understand, in listening to my noble and learned friend's explanation, and I do not at this moment understand, where the distinction between Hemlington and Stainton is. But if I am wrong as to the operation of the devise, B the question then arises whether the two estates by force of the ultimate trust do not go over to the Darnells. The Vice-Chancellor decided that they did not, and did not give any opinion on the point of law which I have already considered. My noble and learned friend held that the Stainton estate did pass to the Darnells under the ultimate trust, but that the Hemlington estate (which also is in the parish of Stainton) did not, but descended to the heir-at-law. He expressed considerable C doubt upon each point, but felt himself bound to defeat what, as it appears to me, was the testator's intention. In considering this point, we assume that the limitations over already considered were contingent, and that the contingency did not happen. In that view, the case stands thus, and perhaps we shall the more readily apprehend the point if we put the trusts of the two estates in juxtaposition.

First the two estates are given to Robert and the heirs of his body.

D "But in case he shall die under the age of twenty-one years and without issue [the Hemlington estate] shall be in trust for Ann Watson and the heirs of her body, but in case she shall die under the age of twenty-one years and without issue . . . upon such and the same trusts as are hereinafter declared concerning my [property] at Stainton aforesaid,"

E viz., to be in trust to pay the rents to his son Richard for his life subject to conditions, and after his decease or other sooner determination of his life-interest, in trust to pay the rents to Richard's wife during her widowhood, "and subject to the trusts hereinbefore thereof declared, the same [property] shall be in trust" for F his three grandchildren (the Darnells) as tenants in common, their respective heirs and assigns for ever. So that in the event provided for the two estates originally given to Robert would be reunited and go to the Darnells. It admits of no doubt that the ultimate trust of the Stainton estate must be added to the previous declared trusts of the Hemlington estate. It seems difficult to maintain that the same trust of both estates will not, if the events happen, carry over both of them. The Stainton estate was held to go over on solid grounds. The ultimate trusts being subject to the trusts hereinbefore declared, carried every interest which the testator had not G before parted with. The devisees, of course, took subject to the contingencies and estates, whatever they were, before declared or given, but they did not take upon the contingencies, or, in other words, their remainder in fee did not depend upon the contingency taking effect. We have seen that the devise of the Stainton estate was in case Robert should die under twenty-one and without issue. That was a contingency which we assume never happened; yet that contingency was held not to H override the ultimate devise to the Darnells. Therefore, the circumstances that the gift over was the last in the series which followed the expression of the contingency upon which the estate was given over did not operate to confine this ultimate gift, like the gifts which precede it, to the happening of the contingency.

What, then, is the distinction between the ultimate gift of Hemlington and the ultimate gift of Stainton? The gifts over, in the first instance, were both upon a I contingency, and upon the same contingency, viz., Robert's death under twenty-one and without issue, and that contingency, although it was held to have failed, did not prevent effect being given to the ultimate gift to the Darnells. The only distinction as to Hemlington is, that, after an estate tail in Ann, the like condition is repeated, viz., in case she shall die under twenty-one and without issue; and that I assume failed like the former one to take effect. But this contingency was held upon appeal to govern the trust for the Darnells and to make it dependent upon that contingency, which not having happened, the trust failed and the estate went to the heir-at-law. But the like contingency as to both estates was held not to affect the ultimate trust of Stainton. If, therefore, both estates had been given to the son and his wife, and then to the Darnells, they would have taken both, as they have taken one of them, notwithstanding the contingency had not happened.

This, I think, was rightly decided. The simple question then is whether the introduction into the trusts of Hemlington of another limitation with a contingent gift over in all respects similar to the one and with the like contingency which preceded the gift of Stainton, can vary the construction. Can it matter whether there be one contingent gift over or two such gifts? In either case the gifts all follow a contingency, but that does not affect the ultimate trust, because it is not dependent upon any contingency, but is only subject to the trusts before declared. The construction would be the same if twenty different contingencies had before been provided for. I should hold this opinion if the gift of Hemlington stood alone, but I consider the decision as to the Stainton estate, of which I approve, as an authority for the like construction as to the Hemlington estate. I could not hold that the ultimate trust of the latter estate took effect, notwithstanding that Robert attained twenty-one, and yet was prevented from having that operation because Ann attained twenty-one. To sustain that view we must, I think, overrule the decision in both of the courts below as to the Stainton estate, and that I am not prepared to do.

I am bound to add, though I have great respect for what has fallen from my noble and learned friend, I cannot see the distinction he draws between the two estates. I understand him to say that there were two contingencies, but I have not heard any distinction as to the general effect of a gift over being open to a different construction according to whether there be one contingency or two contingencies. One contingency has been held not to affect the gift over; "subject to the trusts before declared," you take everything that is not disposed of. Two contingencies have been held to prevent the estate from going over. Yet it is given in exactly the same words, "subject to the trusts before declared." Therefore, although I have no doubt I am wrong, because both my noble and learned friends think so—they have seen what I have written and it has failed to make any impression upon them—yet I must say that, having carefully considered this case, I am utterly unable to see where I am wrong.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—I have paid the closest attention to this case and to the arguments at your Lordships' Bar, and also to the opinion of my noble and learned friend, LORD ST. LEONARDS. I have fully considered the reasoning on both sides, and have determined that I ought to concur in recommending your Lordships to affirm the order of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack—though with the hesitation that one must naturally feel when such authorities disagree.

I think my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack was right in the construction which he put upon the clause in the will on which the case depends. I have been long and deeply impressed with the wisdom of the rule, now I believe universally adopted—at least, in the courts of law in Westminster Hall, that in construing wills, and indeed statutes, and all written instruments, the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words is to be adhered to, unless that would lead to some absurdity or some repugnance or inconsistency with the rest of the instrument, in which case the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words may be modified so as to avoid that absurdity or inconsistency, but no further. This is laid down by BURTON, J., in a very excellent opinion, which is to be found in Warburton v. Loveland d. Ivie (10), 1 Hud. & B. at p. 648. The expression that the rule of construction is to be the intention of the testator is apt to lead into error, because that word is capable of being understood in two senses, viz., that which the testator intended to have done, and that which is the meaning of the words which he has used. The will must be in writing, and the only question is: What is the meaning of the words used in that writing—to ascertain which, every part of it must be considered with the help of those surrounding circumstances which are admissible in evidence to explain the words and put the court as nearly as possible in the situation of the

A writer of the instrument according to the principle laid down in the excellent work of SIR JAMES WIGRAM on that subject?

Adopting that rule, I think that the words of the clause in question ought to be read in their ordinary sense, viz., that the trust estate was to go over in the double event of Robert Watson dying before twenty-one and without issue, which event not having happened, the limitation over would not take effect. It cannot certainly
 B be said, that such construction would lead to any absurdity whatever or any absolute inconsistency with the context. Who shall say that the testator might not have thought that, if Robert attained twenty-one, he would be able to cut off the entail and provide for his family, and so no ulterior limitations would be necessary? If the words were quite clear, we could not alter them in order to carry into effect what might reasonably be conjectured (but it would be conjecture only) to have been the
 C design of the testator. If, for instance, the words had been "should die under twenty-one without issue," omitting the word "and," they could not have been understood in any other sense, and the limitation over would, in the event which has happened, have been defective. The whole difficulty in this case arises from the expression "but in case he shall die under the age of twenty-one and without issue," which expression is capable of being read, as a similar expression
 D was by LORD HARDWICKE in Brownsword v. Edwards (4) (2 Ves. Sen. at p. 247); and the simple question is, whether, in the present case, we are bound to read the words in the same way as was done in that case.

I must say that, having heard the observations of my noble and learned friend, LORD SR. LEONARDS, so fully and distinctly stated, I have had a great doubt as to the propriety of the opinion I have formed, and with the high respect I feel for the
 E opinion of my noble and learned friend, have hesitated in coming to a conclusion at variance with his. But the principle of construction which I have laid down is, in my mind, of such paramount consequence that I think it much more important to adhere to it than to follow the authority of the previous decisions of courts upon words in other wills resembling these. We are bound by decided cases for the purpose of securing as much certainty in the administration of the law as the subject
 F is capable of. But when the decision is not upon some rule or principle of law, but upon the meaning of words which differ so much in one instrument from those in another, and when the proper construction is so varied by the peculiar circumstances of each case, it seldom happens that the words of one will are a sure guide for the construction of the words resembling them in another. Besides, the salutary rule of construction I have mentioned may have been misapplied in the particular
 G cases, and then they are no binding authority at all. When, indeed, by any course of decisions, words have acquired a particular signification, it may be presumed that the framer of the instrument uses them in the sense so acquired, and it is fitting so to construe them. But when there has been an instance or two only of the words being read in a different sense from that which they naturally bear, we cannot make any such presumption.

H There is only one case of such a construction of these words—that of Brownsword v. Edwards (4) (2 Ves. Sen. at p. 247)—which bears upon this question. There the testator gave his estates to trustees and their heirs in trust to receive the rents and profits and place them out at interest for the improvement of the estate till his son (for he must be so considered) should attain twenty-one, and if he should live to attain twenty-one or have issue, then to his son and the heirs of his body, but if his
 I son should happen to die before the age of twenty-one, and without issue, then in trust till his daughter should attain twenty-one, and if she should happen to die (using exactly the same words), then over. Consequently, as soon as John attained twenty-one or had issue, though he died before twenty-one, a fee tail vested in the son. He did attain twenty-one, and had that fee tail as he would have had if he had had issue. LORD HARDWICKE held that the subsequent words could by a natural construction be read as importing that if John should happen to die before twenty-one, and also should happen to die without issue, so providing for the determination of the estate tail, the estate should go by way of remainder to the daughter. The observation sometimes made on this case, that LORD HARDWICKE read "or" for "and," is not correct, and this is pointed out and explained in Mortimer v. Hartley (6) (6 Exch. at p. 60). If he had done so, and read "or" for "and," he would have deprived the son's issue of the estate in case the son had died before twenty-one with issue, which would have been a strong objection to that construction, for in construing wills, the events which might possibly have happened, as well as those which did happen, are to be considered. The decision, however, is not open to this objection, for this, as has been already stated, is obviated by putting a somewhat forced construction on the words which LORD HARDWICKE adopted.

Upon fully considering that case, I think it may be well doubted whether the true construction of the words was not, after all, the natural and ordinary one, viz., that if the son should attain twenty-one or have issue, then he should have an estate tail, but that, on the other hand, if he died under twenty-one and had no issue, the estate should go on to the daughter. This is the simple and natural meaning of the words. There was nothing in the least unreasonable in it, and it was unnecessary to recur to the very unusual construction adopted by LORD HARDWICKE. Be this as it may, this case has not been followed by a uniform course of other decisions so as to make it binding upon us in the construction of similar words in this will, upon the principle above explained. On the contrary, it is directly infringed upon by Doe d. Usher v. Jessop (5), where the natural and ordinary sense of the same words was adopted. In that case LORD ELLENBOROUGH expressed himself in very strong terms in favour of the rule of construction above stated. He said (12 East, at p. 293):

"Is there not a rule of common sense as strong as any case can be, that words in a will are to be construed according to their natural sense, unless some obvious inconvenience or incongruity would result from so construing them."

The criticisms which have been made on that case—that the other side was not heard, that it was not argued at full length, and that the short observations of LE BLANC and BAYLEY, JJ., were not correct—do not appear to me to detract from its authority. The opinions did not affect the principle of the decision, nor did it require a long argument to enforce and apply the sound rule of construction so forcibly expressed by LORD ELLENBOROUGH. I think that there is no rule more useful and important in the construction of written instruments than this, and that it is by much the wiser course to abide by it.

The result is, that, the event not having happened of Robert Watson having died under twenty-one and without issue, none of the remainders expectant upon his estate has taken effect, and the ultimate remainder is undisposed of by the first part of his will. Upon the second part of the case I concur with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack in the opinion he has expressed as to the Hemlington estate being undevised by the last clause. I am inclined to think that not only the Hemlington estate, but also the Stainton estate was undevised, but as the part of the decree made below relating to Stainton is not appealed against, that part becomes immaterial. I, therefore, concur in the opinion of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appcal dismissed.

Contract—Frustration—Declaration of war—Charterparty—Loading of cargo rendered illegal—Parties absolved from performance.

A declaration of war between Great Britain and a foreign country renders illegal any commercial intercourse between a British subject and an inhabitant of the enemy country. A contract, e.g., a charterparty, involving trading by a British subject with the enemy, which is made before, but is unexecuted when, war is declared is thereupon dissolved and both parties are absolved from its further performance.

Holland v. Hall (1817), 1 B. & Ald. 53; 106 E.R. 20; 12 Digest (Repl.) 313, 2412. F

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in an action brought by the owner of the ship Maria Christina for breach of a charterparty by which it was agreed between him and the defendant as charterer that the ship should sail to Odessa and there load a cargo of grain for carriage to Falmouth.

The charterparty stipulated, among other things, that thirty-five running days were to be allowed the charterer for loading and unloading, to commence at the port of loading on the ship being ready to load, laying days at port of discharge to commence the day after her arrival and report at Custom House, and being ready to unload; and for demurrage over and above the laying days at the rate of £4 per day. The shipowner pleaded that he was ready and willing to perform the charterparty, but that the charterer made default in loading the agreed cargo, detained the ship on demurrage at Odessa for ten days over and above the laying days mentioned in the charterparty, and refused to pay the sum of £4 per day due and payable for demurrage. By his defence the charterer said that after the making of the charterparty, and before the ship arrived at Odessa and he had purchased any cargo to be loaded in her, namely, on Mar. 29, 1854, Her Majesty the Queen declared war against the Emperor of Russia, and from that time war existed between the Queen and the Emperor and Odessa was a hostile port in the possession of the Queen's enemies, so that it became impossible for him to perform his agreement and fulfil the terms of the charterparty without trading with the Queen's enemies, and as a result the charterparty was wholly rescinded. G H I

When the case came before the Court of Queen's Bench the court held that the charterer's plea was no answer to the action, because it was possible, and even probable, that a cargo might have been furnished and loaded at Odessa by the charterer's factors without illegally trading with the subjects of Russia, and that,

A supposing the plea to mean that a cargo had not been obtained before the arrival of the ship and could not afterwards be procured without purchasing from Russian subjects, still it did not result in a dissolution of the contract, as the purchase of a cargo before the arrival of the ship was a mode of dealing under the contract open and probable. Therefore, the charterer, having by his own choice disabled himself from performing his contract, could not set up his omission to procure a cargo before the ship's arrival as an excuse for the alleged breach of the charterparty.

B The charterer appealed.

Mellish (W. H. Watson with him) for the charterer.

Cur. adv. vult.

C May 29, 1857. WILLES, J., read the following judgment of the court.—This case was argued before our lamented colleagues, JERVIS, C.J., and ALDERSON, B., together with SIR FREDERIC POLLOCK, C.B., CRESSWELL, J., CROWDER, J., and myself. Upon the argument all the members of the court were unanimous as to the result of the judgment we ought to pronounce; but in consequence of the importance of the case, we took time to consider and state our reasons for that judgment.

D The principal question in the case is, in effect, whether the charterparty made before the late Russian war between an English merchant and a neutral shipowner, whereby it was agreed that the neutral vessel should proceed to Odessa, a port of Russia, and there load from the charterer's factors a complete cargo of wheat, seed or other grain, and proceed therewith to Falmouth, with usual provisions as to laying days and demurrage, was dissolved by the war between England and Russia, taken as true, for the purpose of the present discussion, to have broken out before the vessel arrived at Odessa, and to have continued up to and during the time when the loading was to have taken place, it being further alleged in the plea that from the time war was declared it became and was impossible for the charterer to perform his agreement without dealing and trading with the Queen's enemies. It is now fully established that, inasmuch as the presumed object of the war is as much

E to cripple the enemy's commerce as to capture his property, the declaration of war imports a prohibition of commercial intercourse and correspondence with the inhabitants of the enemy's country, and that such intercourse, except with the licence of the Crown, is illegal.

F Doubt was thrown upon the law on this subject by Bell v. Gilson (1), where BULLER and HEATH, JJ. (ROOKE, J., dissentiente) held that the insurance of goods purchased in Holland during hostilities between England and Holland, on board a neutral ship, was lawful. That case, however, was, in the year 1800, overruled (LORD KENYON being Chief Justice) by the Court of Queen's Bench in Potts v. Bell (2), which, together with the great case of The Hoop (3) (1799), before LORD STOWELL, then SIR WILLIAM SCOTT, upon the authority of which Potts v. Bell (2) was decided, restored and finally established the rule already mentioned—that one

G of the consequences of war is the absolute interdiction of all commercial intercourse or correspondence between the subjects of the hostile countries, except by the permission of their respective sovereigns. The Hoop (3) and Potts v. Bell (2) further established that it is illegal for a subject, in time of war, without licence, to bring from the enemy's port, even in a neutral ship, goods purchased in the enemy's country after the commencement of hostilities, although not appearing to have been

H purchased from the enemy—in effect, that trading with the inhabitants of an enemy's country is trading with the enemy.

I In The Hoop (3), LORD STOWELL, after laying down the rule that trading with the enemy, except under a royal licence, works the property to confiscation, and citing numerous cases in support of that rule, proceeds to say (1 Ch. Rob. at pp. 216, 217) :

"The cases which I have produced prove that the rule has been rigidly enforced where Acts of Parliament have on different occasions been made to relax the Navigation Law and other revenue Acts; where the government has authorised, under the sanction of an Act of Parliament, a homeward trade from the enemy's possessions, but has not specifically protected the outward trade to the same, though ultimately connected with that homeward trade, and almost necessary to its existence; that it has been enforced where strong claims, not merely of convenience but almost of necessity, excused it on behalf of the individual; that it has been enforced where cargoes have been retained before the war, but where the parties have not used all possible diligence to countermand the voyage after the first notice of hostilities; and that it has been enforced not only against the subjects of the Crown, but likewise against its allies in the war, upon the supposition that the rule was founded on the strong and universal principle which allied States in war have a right to induce and apply mutually to each other's subjects. Indeed, it is less necessary to produce these cases, because it is expressly laid down by LORD MANSFIELD, as I understand him (see Gist v. Mason (4)), that such is the maritime law of England; and he who for so long a time assisted at the decisions of that court [Prize Appeals], and at that period, could hardly have been ignorant of the rule of decision on this important subject, though none of the instances which I happen to possess proves him to have been personally present at those particular judgments. What is meant by the addition 'but this does not extend to a neutral vessel,' it is extremely difficult to conjecture, because no man was more perfectly apprised that the neutral bottom gives, in no case, any sort of protection to a cargo that is otherwise liable to confiscation, and, therefore, I cannot but conclude that the words of that great person must have been received with some slight degree of misapprehension."

The force of a declaration of war has been equal to that of an Act of Parliament prohibiting intercourse with the enemy except by the Queen's licence. As an act of State done by virtue of the prerogative exclusively belonging to the Crown, such a declaration carries with it all the force of law. It is founded upon the jus belli, which LORD COKE (Co. Litt. 11, b) states to be a portion of the law of England, adding "in republica maxime conservanda sunt jura belli."

This force has been attributed to it, among other cases, in Furtado v. Rodgers (5), where LORD ALVANLEY, C.J., said (3 Bos. & P. at p. 198):

"We are all of opinion that, on the principle of the English law, it is not competent to any subject to enter into a contract to do anything which may be detrimental to the interests of his own country, and that such a contract is as much prohibited as if it had been expressly prohibited by Act of Parliament. It is admitted that if a man contracts to do a thing which is afterwards prohibited by Act of Parliament, he is not bound by his contract. . . . And on the same principle, where hostilities commence between the country of the underwriter and the assured, the former is forbidden to fulfil his contract."

Accordingly, in that case it was held that an insurance effected in Great Britain on a French ship, though before the commencement of hostilities between Great Britain and France, did not bind the insurers to indemnify the assured against a loss by British capture in a subsequent war, although the policy contained general words of insurance against all captures and detentions of prizes without any exception of the acts of the insurer's own government. These remarks as to the force of a declaration of war furnish a complete answer to the dictum attributed to MARTIN, B., in the report of Clementson v. Blessig (6) (11 Exch. at p. 141), relied upon by the plaintiff. That case itself was decided upon the ground that, by the terms of the declaration of war, the performance of the contract there in question was permitted, and, therefore, it does not affect the present discussion, and we need not give any opinion upon the point there decided.

As to the mode of operation of war upon contracts of affreightment made before, but which remain unexecuted at the time war is declared, and of which it makes the granting execution unlawful or impossible, the authorities establish that the effect is to dissolve the contract and to absolve both parties from further perform-

A ance of it. Such was the opinion of LORD ELLENBOROUGH at a time when the question must necessarily have often arisen, and was well considered and understood in Barker v. Hodgson (7), where it was held that the prevalence of an infectious disorder at the port of loading and consequent prohibition of intercourse by the law of the port were not sufficient to excuse the charterers from loading. LORD ELLENBOROUGH, in delivering judgment, said (3 M. & S. at p. 270):

B "The question here, is, on which side the burden is to fall. If, indeed, the performance of this covenant had been rendered unlawful by the government of the country, the contract would have been dissolved on both sides; and this defendant, inasmuch as he had been thus compelled to abandon his contract, would have been excused for the nonperformance of it, and not liable to damages; but if, in consequence of the events which happen at a foreign port, C the freighter is prevented from furnishing or loading that which he has contracted to furnish, the contract is neither dissolved, nor is he excused for not performing it, but must answer in damages."

A similar opinion was expressed by the same eminent judge in Atkinson v. Ritchie (8).

D LORD TENTERDEN also, in his work on SHIPPING, in the edition by SHEE, J., states the law thus (10th Edn., p. 426):

E "Another general rule of law furnishes a dissolution of these contracts [for the carriage of goods in merchant ships] by matter extrinsic. If an agreement be made to do an act lawful at the time of such agreement, but afterwards, and before the performance of the act, the performance be rendered unlawful by the govern- F ment of the country, the agreement is absolutely dissolved. If, therefore, before the commencement of a voyage, war or hostilities should take place between the State to which the ship or cargo belongs, and that to which they are destined, or commerce between them be wholly prohibited, the contract for conveyance is at an end; the merchant must unload his goods, and the owners find another employment for their ship. And probably the same principles would apply to the same events happening after the commencement and before the completion of the voyage, although a different rule is laid down in this case by the French ordinance."

It may be added that the cases above put by LORD TENTERDEN cannot be treated as isolated propositions, but as instances of the general principle of law to which they G are prefaced.

H CHANCELLOR KENT, in his COMMENTARIES (4th Edn.), vol. 3, p. 248, after stating that the contract of affreightment may be dissolved without execution, not only by the act of the parties, but also by the act of the law, proceeds to state that, inter alia, war making performance unlawful or impossible, either before or after the commencement, dissolves the contract. The same distinguished person held, in the I court of errors in New York, that a contract of partnership with a foreigner was absolutely dissolved by the breaking out of war between the two countries: Griswold v. Waddington (9). Further, there is very high authority for saying that the removal of merchandise, even though acquired before the war, from the enemy's country after knowledge of the war, without a royal licence is, as a general rule, illegal. This was laid down in The St. Philip (10), referred to and stated by SIR JOHN NICHOLL in his admirable argument in Potts v. Bell (2), where the Lords Commissioners of Appeal, refused to give the claimants liberty to prove that their goods were bought before the war. The same law was laid down by STORY, J., in The St. Lawrence (11), and The Joseph (12): see also WILLARD PHILLIP's very able work on INSURANCE (3rd Edn.), vol. 1, 136, et seq. The cases before LORD STOWELL of the Juffrow Catharina (13), and Madonna delle Gracie (14), in which that great judge fastened upon peculiar circumstances to except the claimants from the operation of the general rule, tend strongly to confirm its applicability in all cases in which trade or intercourse with the enemy after knowledge of the war is involved in the shipment.

And in such cases the circumstance of a previous purchase seems, as a general rule, to be matter for the consideration of the Crown in its clemency alone. A

The law as to trading with the enemy was considered and acted upon by the Court of Queen's Bench in Reid v. Hoskins (15)—a case identical in its facts with the present, except that the shipowners in that case were British subjects. It was there decided that the contract was dissolved, and the parties absolved from its performance, among other reasons stated, because, without any previous default on the charterers' part, the performance had become illegal by the declaration of war, and its consequences. But it was also in that case stated in the judgment of the court to be material that the owners of the ship were British subjects, and it was said (4 E. & B. at p. 985): B

"It was, therefore, the duty of the captain of the ship, as soon as he had heard of the declaration of war, to make his escape and to seek a place of safety, instead of lingering at Odessa in the hope of obtaining a cargo, although he might safely have done so if he had not been a British subject, and the ship had been neutral property;" C

see the result of that case in the Queen's Bench, and in the Exchequer Chamber; and also Avery v. Bowden (16). We entirely concur in the decision of Reid v. Hoskins (15) and in the reasons advanced in the arguments, either of which, however, would, in our opinion, have been sufficient. The fact that it was the duty of the master in that case to leave Odessa and that he could not have received a cargo without dealing and trading with the enemy, was a sufficient ground for the decision that his owners could not recover against the charterers for not loading a cargo which he could not rightfully have received. D

But that was not the only reason stated in the judgment by which it could have been supported. The argument, which was again urged in this case—that, apart from any considerations affecting the shipowner only, the defence was valid by reason of the law also forbidding the charterer to load a cargo, and, as a consequence of that prohibition, dissolving the charterparty, and absolving both parties from further performance—remains to be considered. In order to escape the application of this latter argument, founded upon the principles above stated, it is necessary for the shipowner to establish that the plea of the charterer cannot be true in alleging the impossibility of performance without dealing and trading with them, or, in other words, that the charterer could but for some reason of his own, and notwithstanding the war, have fulfilled his contract in a lawful manner. E

We proceed to consider the argument advanced for that purpose. In the first place, it is said that the contract admitted of being fulfilled after the war broke out, by purchasing the cargo from her Majesty's subjects, or those of her allies at Odessa who may have had wheat, seed or other grain which they were willing to dispose of; it may have been contrary to the law of the enemy's country, and it is assumed that the charterers might lawfully have purchased a cargo from such persons and lawfully have shipped it when so purchased. Assuming, for argument's sake, that this conclusion is correct in point of law (which, independently of express authority, we should have doubted, inasmuch as persons inhabiting an enemy's country are prima facie enemies (The Bernon (17)), and even the Queen's subjects become absolutely enemies if they remain and trade in the enemies' country after they know of the breaking out of war: O'Mealey v. Wilson (18), still it should seem a harsh and unreasonable position that the charterer who, by no wrongful act or default of his own, but by the unquestionably rightful act of his Sovereign in declaring war in the exercise of her undoubted prerogative against the public enemy, should be reduced to the necessity of seeking out at his peril in an enemy's country persons who had acquired the goods before war and were possessed of them under circumstances which established a right to remove them from the enemy's country without a licence. But if it had happened, as was by no means unlikely, that there were no British or French subjects in the enemy's country having such property in their possession to sell, or if there were, that the charterer had pur- F
H
I

A chased from one professing at the time of the sale that he was about to depart, but who afterwards remained so as to acquire the character of an alien enemy—without resorting to that supposition, it is enough to refer to the decision in Potts v. Bell (2) where it was expressly held that goods purchased in the enemy's country since the war, though not from native enemies, could not without a licence be lawfully shipped from an enemy's port, even in a neutral vessel.

B Moreover, it is not correct to say that the charterer, even if he could have succeeded in lawfully acquiring the goods, could have lawfully shipped them, if doing so involved dealing or trading with the enemy. It is more than likely that the cargo could not have been put on board without being passed through the enemy's Custom House, and paying export duties. The passing it through the Custom House and obtaining a Russian permit for its shipment might have been a slight case of dealing with the enemy, but still it would have been a dealing with the enemy. The payment of export duty would have been supplying him directly with the means of carrying on the war. If it were proved to be necessary in point of fact, it would constitute a good defence. The attention of the court below was not directed to this argument, which may be considered one of more practical importance, since we find it was proved at the trial at York, before PLATT, B., in this very case, that the cargo could not have been shipped without payment of export duties to the Russian government. That it is not a far-fetched supposition appears by the fact mentioned in ABBOTT ON SHIPPING, in a note by SHEE, J., 10th Edn., p. 437. This fact, which, though not directly admissible into the argument, suggests a case capable of proof under this plea, in which the charterer would, according to the principles already stated, be absolved from his contract.

E Another case may be put to illustrate the extreme hardship and injustice of enforcing a British subject into such straits as those suggested in the argument for the shipowner, namely, that of one who had chartered several neutral ships before the war, for which, after the war, he had purchased cargoes as they arrived, through himself or any other British subjects remaining in Odessa for that purpose. Whatever British subject had so remained and traded in the enemy's country would be in imminent danger of acquiring the character of an enemy. In our opinion, therefore, the first argument on behalf of the shipowner is not maintainable.

It was further argued on behalf of the shipowner that the breach of contract in question was brought about, not altogether by the war, but partly by the default of the charterer himself in not providing a cargo before the war, and keeping it until the war, and, therefore, until the arrival of the neutral vessel, then to be lawfully loaded in pursuance of the charterparty. Again, assuming, for the sake of argument, that this result would follow in point of law if the charterer had provided a cargo before the war, is it true that he has been guilty of any default? A default, to affect him with injurious consequences, ought to be either a breach of contract with the person who claims to benefit by it, or a breach of some duty imposed by law. Not buying the corn was not the former, because it was expressly stipulated by the charterer that he should lie the laying days within which to provide a ship and cargo, and no breach of that contract had been committed when the war took place; and so far from its being a wrong or default in point of duty, apart from the contract, not to have so provided a cargo, it might have been a prudent and rightful act for the charterer, anticipating the war, to abstain from trading with the inhabitants of the enemy's country and to deprive himself of his property before the war began. To impose upon the charterer the necessity of providing a cargo before the war and of keeping that cargo until the war, and afterwards until the arrival of the vessel, apart from any difficulty as to dealing with the enemy in shipping it, would be to compel one of Her Majesty's subjects to do what he has not contracted to do in order to save himself from being unable to perform his contract by reason of the possible event of a declaration of war intended to injure the Queen's enemies, not her own subjects.

As was stated in the argument, the dictum of LORD ALVANLEY in Touteng v. Hubbard (19), that a man cannot rely on his own default to absolve him from the performance of his contract, seems to us to be inapplicable as it was applied by A him to a totally different state of facts. LORD ALVANLEY was there dealing with a case in which a Swedish vessel had been chartered by a British subject to proceed to a port abroad and take in a cargo there; an embargo was laid by the British government upon the Swedish vessel as a hostile measure against the Swedes; and, by reason of the embargo, the Swedish vessel was unable to proceed to her destination for such a period as would, by reason of dealing in the absence B of excuse, have entitled her to receive the cargo at the port of lading, as contracted.

 The Swedish vessel proceeded further, nevertheless, after the embargo, but did not receive a cargo from the charterer; and in an action subsequently brought by the Swedish shipowner against the British charterer, for not loading a cargo, it was held that the former could not recover by reason of his default being a breach of contract in delaying to proceed on the outward voyage, and that he could not C set up the British embargo as a justification for such default. That dictum, explained by the subsequent matter, is, therefore, inapplicable in a case where there has been no breach of contract and no breach of legal duty. In this case, again, supposing that the charterer had obtained the property before the war, and kept it in the enemy's country with the intention of fulfilling his contract when his vessel arrived, whether there were war or whether there were not, the same diffi- D culty as I before pointed out would arise as to its shipment without passing it through the enemy's custom-house, and possibly by paying export duties to the hostile government. It is clear that the charterer could maintain no action against the shipowner for refusing to take on board a cargo which the charterer could only load by dealing and trading with the enemy; and, on the other hand, neither ought the shipowner to maintain an action against the charterer for not E doing so. This is not an unequal law, because, if war had broken out between the Czar and the King of the Two Sicilies instead of Her Majesty, the vessel would, according to the principles stated above, have been absolved from going to Odessa, and might forthwith have proceeded on another voyage, and even the common principles of reciprocity point out, therefore, that a similar indulgence ought to be allowed to a merchant when, in consequence of war declared by his Sovereign, he F is involved in like difficulty.

Under such circumstances, in all ordinary cases, the more convenient course for both parties would seem to be that both should be at once absolved, so that each, on becoming aware of the fact of a war, the length of which cannot be foreseen, making the voyage or the shipment presumably illegal for an indefinite period, may at once be at liberty to engage in another adventure without waiting for the G bare possibility of the war coming to an end in sufficient time to allow of the contract being fulfilled, or some other opportunity of lawfully performing the contract perchance arising. The law upon this subject was doubtless made, according to the well-known rule, to meet cases of ordinary occurrence, and in times when to permit trading with the enemy, even though neutral, was the exception, not the rule.
 These considerations may explain the origin of the law, authoritatively laid down H in the books as to war at once working an absolute dissolution.

A distinction was suggested between the first alleged breach of contract in not loading the vessel, and the second breach, for demurrage. Inasmuch, however, as the second breach would be proved by the plaintiff showing that the vessel remained in the loading port without being loaded during the demurrage days, no one being there to act on the part of the charterers, we think that that breach I amounts to nothing more than an averment that the vessel was not loaded during those days, and so it stands upon the same footing as the first alleged breach for not loading the vessel during the laying days. We are of opinion that, for a British subject not domiciled in a neutral country—which the charterer cannot be presumed to be—to ship a cargo from an enemy's port, even in a neutral vessel, without licence, is an act prima facie and under all ordinary circumstances of dealing and trading with the enemy, and, therefore, forbidden by the law; that it lies on the person alleging it to be legal to establish the fact; and that, in the absence

A of proof that it would be legal, neither a British subject nor an alien friend can find any action upon the fact of its not having been performed. The Sovereign of this country has the right to proclaim war, with all its consequences, enforcing or mitigating them, either generally or in particular instances, as may be thought best by the government. One of those consequences not removed or dispensed with by any treaty, order in council or licence, or by any special circumstances of necessity in the particular case, is that trade and dealing with the enemy, unless expressly permitted, are forbidden. The plea alleges that the contract could not, from the time of the declaration, have been fulfilled without such dealing and trade. That, as we have already shown upon grounds not considered in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, may be true. If it may be, then, inasmuch as the law justifies what it commands, and inasmuch as it effects that purpose by dissolving

C the contract which, presumably, cannot within any reasonable time be executed without dealing and trading with the enemy, the plea founded upon that state of the law is sufficient. We are, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed, and judgment given for the charterer.

Appeal allowed.

LASSENCE v. TIERNEY

[LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Lord Cottenham, L.C.), November 28, December 6, 7, 10, 11, 1849]

14 Jur. 182; 41 E.R. 1379]

F

Trust—Rule in Lassence v. Tierney—Question of construction—Regard to be paid to whole of trust instrument.

If a testator leaves a legacy absolutely, but restricts the mode of the legatee's enjoyment of it to secure certain objects for the benefit of the legatee, on the failure of those objects the absolute gift prevails, but, if there be no absolute gift as between the legatee and the estate, but particular modes of enjoyment are prescribed, and those modes of enjoyment fail, the legacy forms part of the testator's estate. In the latter case the gift is only for a particular purpose; in the former, the purpose is the benefit of the legatee as to the whole amount of the legacy, and the directions and restrictions are to be considered as applicable to a sum no longer part of the testator's estate, but already the property of the legatee. In every case, therefore, the question must be one of construction, and on construction the intention that the gift should be absolute as between the legatee and the estate is to be collected from the whole of the will, and not from there being words which, standing alone, would constitute an absolute gift.

Appeal from the decree of WIGRAM, V.-C., in the original and supplemental causes made on further directions, by which it was decided that, in the events which had happened, the real and personal estates of the testator in the cause, Matthew Kannan, after the life interest of Catherine Lassence, were undisposed of; that C. Lassence's interest, as heiress-at-law in the undisposed of real estate, did not pass by her will, but descended to her heir-at-law; and that a sum of £420 consols, produced by the sale to a railway company of part of the testator's real estate, was to be deemed real estate. From this decision the plaintiff and defendant in the same interest appealed.

E By his will dated June 14, 1821, the testator, Matthew Kannan, who died in 1823, after directing the payment of all his just debts, funeral expenses, and the charges of proving his will, gave his residuary estate and effects to his wife and two other persons as trustees for certain purposes, and then, after directing the payment of several pecuniary and specific legacies, gave, devised, and bequeathed as follows:

F "I give and bequeath unto my only daughter, Catherine Read, wife of Joseph Read, the residue and remainder of my property wheresoever and whatsoever to receive the interest thereof during her lifetime both in funds, houses and the interest of money arising from any other source . . . without being subject to any control or restraint of her present or any future husband, for her sole use and purpose, her receipts alone to be taken as legal for the money she receives.

G It is also my will that she shall not have any power to dispose of any part of my property during her life unless for the purpose of transferring it from one stock to another or of disposing or selling any houses or moneys in the Funds for the sole purpose of investing it in some other concern or purchase which may be deemed more eligible than where it is already placed out, but this must be done with the entire consent of the executors and executrix. It is also my will that

H the whole property shall be divided between her children after her decease, share and share alike, in the following manner—viz. that the males shall have one half of the property bequeathed to them when they arrive at the age of twenty-three years and to receive the interest of the other or remaining half of their shares during life and to equally divide it among their children after their decease or to the next relation or to their husbands so long as they live, if they should have no issue. I also wish the property or share coming to the females

I to remain invested where it was placed, if secure, or if not deemed so to be placed in any other way the executors may deem proper without incurring risk of its being lost or misplaced and to receive the interest only during their lives without being subject to any restraint or control from their husbands. And if it can be proved that they shall even attempt to dispose or sell their life interest in it it is my will that the property do go over to their brothers and that they shall be entirely deprived of it; after their decease their part of the property to be divided, share and share alike, between their children, and if they have no issue among their husbands during their lifetime, then go to the nearest relation on their mother's side. It shall and may be lawful to and for the said trustees or the survivor or survivors of them or the executors or administrators of such survivors in case of the death of any of them or his or their desire to be discharged from the trusts reposed in them before the accomplishment of the said several trusts to nominate one trustee or trustees for the purposes aforesaid to keep up the number of the said trustees with like power to them and such new trustee or trustees in case of their death or wish to be discharged from the said trusts to keep up the same number of trustees, and each trustee to be only accountable for his own act and deed."

Catherine Read had four children, three of whom died in the lifetime of her husband, Joseph Read, infants and unmarried, and the fourth of whom died shortly after him, also an infant and unmarried. Joseph Read died in April, 1833, having, by his will, given all his property to his wife for her own use and benefit, and appointed her his sole executrix. On Aug. 12, 1834, Catherine Read became the wife of J. G. Lassence. There were no children of this marriage, and previously to filing the bill next hereinafter mentioned, Catherine Lassence took out administration to her four children by Joseph Read, all then deceased. On Jan. 20, 1842, Catherine Lassence, by her next friend, filed her bill against the executors of Matthew Kannan, stating, among other things, that upon the occasion of her marriage with J. G. Lassence, and before the solemnization thereof, it had been agreed between her and J. G. Lassence that he should invest a sum of £3,000, part of her property, in the purchase of a governmental annuity for his life, in his own name and for his own use and benefit, and that she should be entitled to hold and enjoy all the residue of her property, whether derived from the testator, Matthew Kannan, or from her former husband, or in any other manner, for her sole and separate use, and that, if necessary, a proper settlement thereof should be executed by them respectively; and further stating, that, in pursuance of such agreement, £3,000, part of the property of Catherine Lassence, had been laid out and invested by Catherine Lassence in the purchase of a government life annuity, in the name and for the benefit of J. G. Lassence, and that he had received and enjoyed the same accordingly ever since their marriage, but that no settlement had been made upon Catherine Lassence of the other part of her property, and that in the events which had happened, and in case she should not have any other issue, she would be entitled in remainder, expectant upon the life estate given to her by the will of the testator, Matthew Kannan, to the corpus of his real and personal estate; and that she, Catherine Lassence, was then in the fiftieth year of her age, and, according to the course of nature, was not likely to have any other child; and that, under such circumstances, she was then entitled to have the corpus of the personal estate transferred to her, and praying that the trusts of the will of the testator, Matthew Kannan, might be declared, and so far as the same remained to be performed, that such trusts might be carried into execution by and under the direction and decree of the court; that all proper and necessary accounts might be taken, and directions given for ascertaining of what the clear residue of the testator's estate then consisted, and that the rights of the plaintiff therein might be declared.

On Mar. 7, 1843, the cause came on before the Master of the Rolls, who made an order referring it to the Master to make the usual inquiries relative to the family of the testator, and further ordered, among other things, that the defendants should transfer into court, to an account to be entitled "the account of the produce of the testator's real estate the sum of £420 15s. 2d. Bank £3 per cent. annuities, which had arisen from the sale to the Blackwall Rail. Co., as hereinbefore stated." On Oct. 21, 1843, after the filing of this bill, an indenture was made between J. G. Lassence, of the first part, James Fawcett, of the second part, and Catherine Lassence, of the third part, purporting to be a settlement made in pursuance of the parol agreement entered into between J. G. Lassence and Catherine Lassence, previously to their marriage, as before mentioned. By this indenture, which was

A signed by Catherine Lassence and the other parties, J. G. Lassence assigned to J. Fawcett all the interest of Catherine Lassence in the estate of Matthew Kannan upon trust among other things to pay, transfer, and assign the same unto such person or persons and in such manner and form and to and for such uses intents and purposes as she the said Catherine Lassence by any instrument in writing under her hand and seal attested by two or more credible witnesses or by her last will

B and testament should direct and appoint; and in default of such direction or appointment unto such person or persons as should be entitled thereto (if the said Catherine Lassence had not intermarried with J. G. Lassence) according to the Statute of Distributions.

This indenture was never acknowledged by Catherine Lassence as required by the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833. She died on May 14, 1847, without having had

C any child by J. G. Lassence, and having, by her will dated May 12, 1847, made in pursuance of the power given her by the indenture of Oct. 21, 1843, given the residue of her property unto J. G. Lassence and James Fawcett in trust for J. G. Lassence, S. Read, and R. Read, in equal thirds, and appointed J. G. Lassence and J. Fawcett, her executors. On July 20, 1847, J. G. Lassence and James Fawcett filed their bill of revivor and supplement against the surviving trustee and executor

D of the testator, Matthew Kannan, the heir-at-law of Catherine Lassence, and other parties, including S. Read and R. Read, stating the several facts above mentioned, and that they had procured administration de bonis non to the deceased children of Joseph Read, and praying a revival of the original suit, and that the agreement entered into between J. G. Lassence and Catherine Lassence previously to their marriage might be decreed to be carried into effect so far as it remained to be

E carried into effect, under the direction of the court, and for that purpose that the heir-at-law of Catherine Lassence might be decreed to convey all his estate and interest in her real estates to the aforesaid appointees, or as they should direct; and that (if necessary) the want of an acknowledgment of the indenture of Oct. 21, 1843, by Catherine Lassence, might be supplied by the court, in favour of her appointees, and, if necessary for that purpose, that the will of Catherine Lassence

F might be established and declared to be a good execution of the power given to her in and by the settlement of Oct. 21, 1843. The suit having been revised, the Master, on Mar. 26, 1849, made his general report, finding the various classes of relations of the testator Matthew Kannan and his family.

Cur. adv. vult.

H Dec. 10, 1849. LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., read the following judgment.—There is no doubt as to the rule upon which the principal question in this case—the title to the personalty—must be decided. In this and the many similar cases which have occurred, the only question is the application of the rule to the facts.

I If a testator leave a legacy absolutely as regards his estate, but restricts the mode of the legatee's enjoyment of it to secure certain objects for the benefit of the legatee, on the failure of such objects the absolute gift prevails, but, if there be no absolute gift as between the legatee and the estate, but particular modes of enjoyment are prescribed, and those modes of enjoyment fail, the legacy forms part of the testator's estate. In the latter case the gift is only for a particular purpose; in the former, the purpose is the benefit of the legatee as to the whole amount of the legacy, and the directions and restrictions are to be considered as applicable to a sum no longer part of the testator's estate, but already the property of the legatee. In every case, therefore, the question must be one of construction, and except for the purposes of such construction, very little assistance can be derived from former decisions. It is, however, obvious that the intention that the gift should be absolute as between the legatee and the estate is, as in all cases of construction, to be collected from the whole of the will, and not from there being words which, standing alone, would constitute an absolute gift. A

In Scawin v. Watson (1) there were words of absolute gift of the £1,000, but LORD LANGDALE, M.R., considered the whole direction to amount to a gift of the £1,000 for the benefit of the daughter to pay her the interest for life, with remainder to her children, and, upon appeal, I concurred in this opinion, and affirmed his lordship's order. In Gompertz v. Gompertz (2) there were words which, standing alone, would have amounted to an absolute gift, but special provisions followed, which failing, SHADWELL, V.-C., held that the fund was undisposed of, and upon appeal I affirmed that decision, stating that in the cases cited there was a gift and then a direction as to the manner in which the legacy was to be applied for the benefit of the legatee, not a qualification or diminution of the original gift, but merely a direction as to the mode in which it was to be dealt with and enjoyed in a certain case. Upon again examining the earlier cases, I adhere to this description of them. In Campbell v. Brownrigg (3) there was a direct gift of the 50,000 sicca rupees, to be employed for the use of the legatee in the following manner. That manner of employment having failed, LORD LYNDEHURST, reversing the decision of SHADWELL, V.-C., held that the legatee's title was absolute, saying that to the extent prescribed the use was controlled, but no further. The other cases cited for the appellant, Winckworth v. Winckworth (4), Hulme v. Hulme (5), Mayer v. Townsend (6), Whittell v. Dudin (7) (in which case SIR THOMAS PLUMER, M.R., very clearly expounds the rule) proceeded upon the same distinction. Carver v. Bowles (8) and Kampf v. Jones (9), which was founded upon it, were cases of the execution of powers in which there were absolute appointments within the powers and attempts to modify the enjoyment beyond the powers, and it was held that the absolute appointments were to prevail. B C D E

Looking, therefore, at this will for the purpose of considering whether the testator intended an absolute gift with directions as to the mode in which the property so given should be enjoyed by the legatee, or that the gift should only take effect in the several cases and for the several purposes specified, it appears to me sufficiently clear that the latter was his intention. The will itself, although extremely inaccurately worded, and, therefore, creating a difficulty in ascertaining with any great certainty what in particular passages was the real intention of the testator, when carefully examined, leaves no doubt of what his intention was. In the first place, he appoints his wife and two other persons executors and trustees, and gives the property to them. There were certain specific purposes to be answered, annuities and debts to be paid, and other directions to be followed; then he disposes of the residue, and, having appointed three persons executors and those same three persons trustees for the earlier purposes of his will, he deals with that residue in these terms: F G

"I give and bequeath to my only daughter, Catherine Read, wife of Joseph Read, the residue and remainder of my property whatsoever and where-soever . . ." H

On the part of the appellants it is desired that it should be read as if this was an end of the gift, and in that case, no doubt, it would be an absolute gift, capable of being controlled, perhaps, by other parts of the will, but still in terms an absolute gift. It appears, however, to me quite clear that this is not a gift of the beneficial interest in the property, but a gift to the legatee for certain purposes, which are afterwards prescribed. If there was any doubt about that, the words that follow, "to receive," would tend to remove it. A further proof is afforded by the provision under which the legatee has the power of transferring or disposing of the principal of the funds, which she may do only for the purpose of changing from one security to another; and in the exercise of that discretion she is to call in aid the opinion of the other executors. I

A It is a gift to her, therefore, of the residue, but it is a gift of the residue in trust, and the trusts are afterwards declared. If the words, instead of being "to receive," had been "in trust," there could have been no question raised, and the first point that occurs is whether it is not sufficiently evident on the face of the will that, the primary object being answered of paying debts and legacies, the gift to her was not in trust to carry the further purposes of the will into effect? The gift is to her
B to receive the interest during her lifetime. If the words had been "in trust to retain her interest during her lifetime," there would have been an end of the question. She is, however,

"to receive the interest during her lifetime both in funds houses and the interest of moneys arising from any other source . . . without being subject to any control or restraint."

C Then come those provisions which were obviously intended to protect her against the marital authority in the event of her having a husband, which is followed by the prohibition against selling.

Having thus directed her to retain the interest for life, the testator says :

D "It is also my will that the whole property shall be divided between her children after her decease, share and share alike."

Here, again, the appellants would stop and say there is an absolute gift to the children, but that is stopping in the middle of a sentence, and in ascertaining the intention of the testator, words cannot be struck out which are so immediately connected with the gift as to show exactly what is meant. Here the direction is
E to divide among the children in manner following, that is to say, sons when they shall attain twenty-three. Taking that as one direction, which undoubtedly it is, because the effect of the words "in manner following" is the same as if the manner had been incorporated in the gift—it was a gift to the children of the tenant for life when they shall attain twenty-three; it is a gift to a class of persons some of whom may be born after the testator's own death, and who are not to have the gift till
F they are twenty-three, then, and not till then, and among such children, and not other children, the property is to be divided. A gift to divide property among unborn children at twenty-three, is a gift void for remoteness : Leake v. Robinson (10); and, consequently, it appears to me quite plain that the moiety given to the sons falls within this rule. It is the same as if none of the sons had attained twenty-three; it is, therefore, undisposed of, and goes with the residue of the property.

G It is not now in dispute that all the ulterior limitations are void, because they are not only to children's children, but to children born, not only after the death of the tenant for life, but after the death of a tenant for life not in being. On this point all parties are agreed.

Then comes a most important part of this will, as it appears to me, bearing upon the question whether there is an absolute gift to Catherine Read or only a direction
H to her to retain the income for her life. The testator contemplates there being children of his daughter, and children of those children, and, having provided for these events, he next provides for the only other event which could happen, namely, there not being children, and says, "and if they have no issue . . . then go to the nearest relation on their mother's side," thus disposing of all beneficial interest after the life estate given to the daughter. There is a gift to the daughter for life and then
I to her children; the testator also endeavours to provide for her children's children; and if there are no children, then he makes a gift over. How is this consistent with the intention that there should in any event be an absolute gift to the daughter and merely a mode of enjoyment prescribed by providing for her and her family? That he has given everything away in every possible event is totally inconsistent with such an intention.

During the argument I asked if there was any case in which such a construction had prevailed. The point can only be material when the first expressions are ambiguous, for if there is a distinct positive gift, and the intention is express, of course nothing that afterwards follows can affect the construction of the positive gift; but where the first gift is capable of two constructions, other parts of the will are to be looked at to see what the testator's intention was, and no doubt a disposition of the whole property under all circumstances that can arise is an important consideration in putting a construction on ambiguous expressions. I have looked at every case referred to, and have endeavoured to find others, but I find no case in which the question has arisen where there has been an attempt to give away the whole interest in every possible event that the testator contemplated, nor does it seem possible that these two intentions could exist together. If they are both found in the same will, the court may have to decide which is to prevail, but, if the first is ambiguous and the other is not, the unambiguous expression must have great effect in controlling that which is ambiguous, in order, if possible, to make every part of the will coincide, and that there may not be a violation of any provision in any part of it. No case exactly like the present has arisen.

In Kampf v. Jones (9) the question arose on the execution of a power, and the court held that the gift to the first taker was within the power, and, therefore, good, but that the attempt there made to regulate and control the future enjoyment of the property by limiting it over to the unborn children of the first taker was beyond the power, and therefore bad, thus deciding that the appointment, when good for the benefit of the first taker, could not be controlled by that which followed which was beyond the reach of the power. It is quite true that there, as here, the court had to look to what was the intention, because if it appeared from the whole of the will that there was no intention to appoint absolutely to the first taker, undoubtedly it would operate on the question before the court. It seems that the opinion of the court was very much regulated by the fact that it was an execution of a power, and that that part of the will which ineffectually attempted to execute the power, being beyond the power, could not control an absolute and antecedent gift in the early part of the will. The argument, however, which there seemed to operate on the mind of the court was that there was an absolute, positive, and undoubted exercise of the power so as to amount to an appointment in the first instance, and that, therefore, the subsequent part of the will, if inconsistent with it, could not be considered as controlling an unquestionable gift. So, if there had been in the present case an unquestionable gift in the early part of the will, I should have attached some weight to it; but it is because the first part of the will is doubtful and ambiguous and capable of a different construction that we are to look at other parts of the will to see what construction is most consistent with the apparent intention of the testator.

Looking at this will, and without at all infringing on any one of the cases that have occurred, it appears to me that there is not in this case that absolute positive gift in the first instance which would bring it within the principle of any of the decided cases. I think, on the contrary, that the whole provision, taken together, is sufficient to show there was no intention that the original legatee should take the absolute interest, subject to any control for her own benefit as to the mode of enjoyment, but that the intention was that she should have an estate for life, and life only, and a provision for her family, which, from the mode in which it is to be carried into effect, becomes inoperative in law, and that, consequently, on her death the property becomes undisposed of, and forms part of the testator's residue.

Appeal dismissed.

SUSSEX PEERAGE CASE

[Reported 11 Cl. & Fin. 85; 6 State Tr.N.S. 79; 3 L.T.O.S. 277; 8 Jur. 793; 8 E.R. 1034]

Crown—Marriage—Royal marriage—Prohibition against contracting without consent of Sovereign—Marriage celebrated abroad.

By the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, s. 1: "No descendant of the body of his late Majesty King George 2, male or female (other than the issue of princesses who have married or may hereafter marry into foreign families), shall be capable of contracting matrimony without the previous consent of His Majesty, his heirs or successors signified under the Great Seal, and declared in Council (which consent, to preserve the memory thereof, is hereby directed to be set out in the licence and register of marriage, and to be entered in the books of the Privy Council); and every marriage or matrimonial contract of any such descendant without such consent first had and obtained, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever." This enactment applies to a marriage celebrated abroad.

Evidence—Declaration—Marriage—Prayer-book inscribed by bride—Proof of fact of marriage.

On the hearing of a claim to a peerage the claimant sought to prove the legal marriage of his parents by putting in evidence a prayer-book containing an undated entry in his mother's handwriting stating that the prayer-book was one "by which I was married at Rome" to the claimant's father on April 4, 1793.

Held: the entry was admissible as a declaration by the claimant's mother of the fact of the marriage, but not as proof of its validity.

Evidence—Declaration—Marriage—Will of deceased person—Declaration in solemn form of marriage and legitimacy of son—Declaration made post litem motam—Inadmissibility.

The will of a deceased peer, declaring in the most solemn form his marriage and the legitimacy of his son (the claimant to the peerage), was proposed to be read as a declaration made by one of the parties, but it was rejected as being post litem motam, the date and certain expressions in it showing it to have been executed after a suit to annul the marriage of the deceased peer had been instituted by his father.

H Evidence—Declaration against pecuniary interest—Subject-matter within peculiar knowledge of declarant—Statement made in course of business—"Against interest"—Fear of prosecution for criminal offence—Declarant in extremis—Danger and fear of death and death in fact following.

The declaration of a deceased person is receivable in evidence when it was made against the proprietary or pecuniary interest of the person making it and the subject-matter of the declaration was within the peculiar knowledge of that person, or when it was made, orally or in writing, in the course of the business of the person making it. A statement made by a person who at the time he made it apprehended his being prosecuted for a criminal offence relating to the subject-matter of the statement would not render the statement admissible as being made against his interest.

A declaration by a person in extremis is admissible in evidence when there was actual danger of death, a full apprehension of death, and death in fact followed.

Evidence—Foreign law—Proof by expert witness—Right of witness to refer to books and documents.

A

What is foreign law is a question of fact provable by a witness having knowledge of the law in question. The witness can refer to books and documents which, he states, correctly set out the foreign law to refresh his memory and assist him in stating what the law is.

Statute—Construction—According to intent of Parliament—Words to be given natural and ordinary meaning—Ambiguous words—Consideration of ground and cause of making statute—Recourse to preamble.

By THE JUDGES: The only rule for the construction of Acts of Parliament is that they should be construed according to the intent of the Parliament which passed the Act. If the words of the statute are of themselves precise and unambiguous, then no more can be necessary than to expound those words in their natural and ordinary sense. The words themselves alone do, in such case, best declare the intention of the legislature. If, however, any doubt arises from the terms employed by the legislature, it has always been held a safe means of collecting the intention to call in aid the ground and cause of making the statute and to have recourse to the preamble which is "a key to open the minds of the makers of the Act, and the mischiefs which they intended to redress": per DYER, C.J., in Stowel v. Lord Zouch (1) (1569), 1 Plowd. 353.

Statute—Operation—Binding effect on British subjects abroad—Intention of legislature.

While an Act of the British legislature can have no obligatory force on the subjects of a foreign State it will bind British subjects both within or without the jurisdiction if such is the intention of the statute.

Petition presented to Her Majesty by Augustus Frederick D'Este, who claimed the honours, dignities, and privileges of Duke of Sussex, Earl of Inverness, and Baron of Arklow, and referred by Her Majesty to the House of Lords and by the House to the Committee for Privileges.

Prince Augustus Frederick was the sixth son of his late Majesty George III; in 1793 he went to Rome, and on April 4 in that year intermarried with Lady Augusta Murray, the second daughter of the Earl and Countess of Dunmore; that marriage was celebrated by a clergyman of the Church of England, in a form as nearly as could be according to the rites of the Church of England, an English prayer-book being used upon the occasion; and it was contracted and attested by two papers signed by his Royal Highness and by Lady Augusta, which papers were in the following terms:

"As this paper is to contain the mutual promise of marriage between Augustus Frederick and Augusta Murray, our mutual names must be put here by us both, and kept in my possession; it is a promise neither of us can break, and is made before God our Creator and all-merciful Father.

"On my knees before God our Creator, I Augustus Frederick promise thee Augusta Murray, and swear upon the Bible, as I hope for salvation in the world to come, that I will take thee Augusta Murray for my wife; for better for worse; for richer for poorer; in sickness and in health; to love and to cherish till death us do part; to love but thee only, and none other; and may God forget me if I ever forget thee. The Lord's name be praised! So bless me! So bless us, O God! And with my handwriting do I Augustus Frederick this sign, Mar. 21, 1793, at Rome; and put my seal to it, and my name.

"(Completed at Rome, April 4, 1793.)"

"On my knees before God my Creator, I Augusta Murray promise and swear upon the Bible, as I hope for salvation in the world to come, to take thee Augustus Frederick for my husband; for better for worse; for richer for poorer; in sickness and in health; to love and to cherish till death us do part. So bless my God, and sign this.

"Augusta Murray."

There were duplicates of these papers; and in the first of them, the words "Married, April 4, 1793, Rome, 7 o'clock at night," were introduced in the place of the words "Completed at Rome, April 4, 1793." The latter words were added on the day A thus mentioned, in the handwriting of his Royal Highness.

The petitioner's Case further stated that the parties were again regularly married in England, that the petitioner was born in the parish of St. Marylebone, London, on Jan. 13, 1794, and that he was the only male issue of the marriage; that by letters patent, dated on Nov. 27, 1801, Prince Augustus Frederick, was created a peer of the realm, by the titles of Baron Arklow, Earl of Inverness, and Duke of Sussex, with limitation to the heirs male of his body, that he afterwards sat and voted in Parliament, and that he died on April 21, 1843, leaving the petitioner his only son and heir male him surviving. B

On Aug. 21, 1843, the Attorney-General made a report to Her Majesty, in which he said :

"It appears to me, on the testimony laid before me, that it is established that the contracts of marriage above set forth were entered into by his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex and the Lady Augusta Murray, at Rome, on Mar. 21, 1793; and I think it may be inferred that the Duke of Sussex and the Lady Augusta Murray considered that they stood in the relation of husband and wife." C

He then expressed his doubts of the fact of any marriage, valid by the laws of England, having been contracted, even independently of the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, and declared that he was not satisfied with the correctness of certain opinions which had been laid before him stating that Act to have no binding force on parties living out of England. He, therefore, recommended Her Majesty to refer the petition to the House of Lords. Accordingly, on Aug. 22 the petition was referred to the House of Lords, and by the House to the Committee for Privileges. E

At the first sitting of the Committee for Privileges, on June 7, 1844, TINDAL, C.J., POLLOCK, C.B., and PATTESON, WILLIAMS, COLTMAN and CRESSWELL, JJ., and PARKE, B., attended.

Sir Thomas Wilde (Erle and James Wilde with him) for the petitioner.

The Attorney-General (Sir W. W. Follett), the Solicitor-General (Sir Frederick Thesiger), and Waddington for the Crown. F

In the course of the evidence of the marriage put forward on behalf of the petitioner, a prayer-book, produced from the papers and documents of Lady Augusta, and containing an entry proved to be in her handwriting, was tendered in evidence. The entry was as follows : G

"The prayer-book by which I was married at Rome to Prince Augustus Frederick, on the 4th day of April, 1793, by the Rev. Mr. —"

The entry itself was without date.

Waddington objected that this entry was not admissible for the purpose of proving the fact to which it related. H

LORD LYNTHURST, L.C.—It is admissible as a declaration by one of the parties that there was a marriage, though not admissible to prove the marriage.

The prayer-book was received, and the entry read.

A will, dated Berlin, Sept. 15, 1799, and proved to be in the handwriting of the prince, and sealed with the royal arms, was tendered in evidence as a declaration I made by him at the time of the fact of his marriage.

Waddington.—This paper cannot be received in evidence, even as a declaration by the party, for it appears by the date to have been made after a suit to annul the prince's marriage. It contains a statement of that suit, and, therefore, by the decision in the Banbury Peerage Case (2), it is inadmissible.

Sir Thomas Wilde.—There never was any lis as to the fact of the marriage; and this declaration, which only states that fact, is, therefore, evidence. The lis only related to the legality of the marriage.

A Waddington.—The paper says: "Notwithstanding a decree has passed Doctors' Commons to declare my marriage unlawful and void, yet I still feel myself bound . . ." It goes on to state that the writer makes the declaration contained in it for the purpose of establishing the legitimacy of his son, which had been called in question by these proceedings. This clearly falls within the ordinary rule of law against admitting declarations post litem motam.

B Sir Thomas Wilde.—This paper is offered in proof only as a declaration of the fact of the marriage. That fact never has been questioned; the passage now read from the paper proves that. The decree never could have been passed to declare a marriage unlawful and void, if no marriage had in fact taken place. The dispute there was on the legal consequences of the marriage, which is quite a collateral matter.

C Waddington.—The suit in which this decree was made was a suit for nullity of marriage, instituted at the instance of the King.

LORD BROUGHAM.—The document shows that there has been a lis; and my opinion is that that makes it impossible for us to receive this document till we see what that lis really was. The argument that the decree only related to the lawfulness of the marriage, and not to the fact of a marriage, cannot be sustained, for the alleged marriage might have been only a pretended marriage.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I have got the report of Heseltine v. Lady Augusta Murray (3), in 2 ADDAMS, 400, n. The libel states that on April 4

E "A marriage, or rather a show or effigy of marriage, between his said Royal Highness Prince Augustus Frederick and the said Lady Augusta Murray, was in fact had and solemnised, or pretended to have been had and solemnised, at the house of the Right Honourable Charlotte, Countess of Dunmore, at the city of Rome, on the 4th day of April, 1793."

F LORD LYNDHURST, L.C.—A declaration of a marriage is only admissible in evidence as a declaration of a legal marriage. The legality of it had been in controversy here. The declaration of a marriage in fact is nothing.

LORD BROUGHAM.—The judgment is to this effect (2 Add. at p. 401, n.):

G "In respect to the fact of marriage, or rather show or effigy of a marriage, pleaded in the said libel to have been had and solemnised, or pretended to have been had and solemnised, at the house of the Right Honourable Charlotte, Countess of Dunmore, in the city of Rome, on the 4th day of April, 1793, there is not sufficient proof by witnesses that any such fact of marriage, or rather show or effigy of a marriage, was in any manner had or solemnised at the said city of Rome, between his said Royal Highness Prince Augustus Frederick and the Right Honourable Lady Augusta Murray, spinster, the parties cited in this cause; but that if any such marriage, or rather show or effigy of a marriage, was in fact had or solemnised at the said city of Rome between the said parties, the said pretended marriage was and is absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes in law whatsoever."

H This judgment distinctly declares, that there is not sufficient to prove the fact of the marriage, but that if it existed in fact, it was null and void. This surely shows

I that the Roman marriage was in issue.

LORD CAMPBELL.—So that the declaration in the will would be in contradiction to the judgment of a court. It cannot be received.

The declarations of Mr. Gunn, made to his son with respect to the marriage, were proposed to be proved in evidence by the son on the ground that they were the declarations of an individual who knew the facts, who was not interested in misrepresenting them, who had an interest in being silent respecting them, and whose statements, he being dead, were, therefore, admissible in evidence.

Sir Thomas Wilde and Erle in support of the evidence tendered.—Mr. Gunn has been proved to have been at Rome at the period in question. By the letters of the prince and of Lady Augusta it is proved that they proposed to be married, and were married by a Mr. Gunn. He had a perfect knowledge of the facts, and was not interested in misrepresenting them, but the contrary. The question to which these declarations relate rests partly on the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, s. 3, which contains a penal [provision rendering liable to penalties any person solemnising a marriage declared null and void by the Act]. There have been proceedings in Chancery. Mr. Gunn was called as a witness, and interrogatories were put to him. He demurred to them on the ground that, if he answered them, he might subject himself to penalties under the Act of 1772. This shows that he not only was not interested in misrepresenting facts to support the marriage, but believed himself to have an interest the other way.

LORD LYNDHURST, L.C.—This question has been put upon two grounds. It is contended in the first place, that as Mr. Gunn might have stood indifferent on this occasion as he had no interest, and as he knew the facts, he being dead, his declarations are receivable in evidence. That is a position which cannot be maintained in this House; for in the Berkeley Peerage Case (4) that point was expressly decided the other way, on reference to the judges. So far as this House is concerned, we cannot again open that question, but must consider that decision of it as final.

The next ground of argument is that in all the cases where the party has known the facts and is dead, and has made declarations, and these declarations are against his interest, and would if he had been living subject him to a prosecution, such declarations are receivable in evidence. That is the broad and general proposition. That proposition cannot be sustained: let us try it by instances ordinarily occurring. A. is indicted for murder. B., who is dead, made while living a declaration that he was present at the murder. That declaration is against his own interest, and would, had he lived, have subjected him to a prosecution. It is in principle the very case supposed in the argument, and it is not possible to say that such a declaration would have been receivable in evidence. Again, suppose the Duke of Sussex had been put upon his trial under the Royal Marriages Act, for contracting this marriage, is it possible to maintain that Mr. Gunn's declarations would have been receivable in evidence against him? It is sufficient to state these instances, to show that the proposition of the learned counsel cannot be maintained. It is not true that the declarations of deceased persons are in all circumstances receivable in evidence when in some way or other they might injuriously affect the interest of the party making them. Nor is it true that because, while living, a party would be excused from answering as to certain facts, his declarations as to those facts become evidence after his death. These are not correlative nor corresponding purposes. Besides, this case is not what for the purposes of this argument it is represented to be. First, Mr. Gunn is said not to have been liable to prosecution. Then these declarations were made to his own son, and in so making them it cannot be presumed that he would have exposed himself to prosecution, or that he made them under any belief that he should do so. These two circumstances take away the main grounds on which the argument for the admission of these declarations has been rested. On no ground, therefore, can these declarations be, in my opinion, received in evidence.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I so entirely agree with my noble and learned friend that I need scarcely trouble your Lordships further than to express my concurrence in what has been expressed in so luminous and convincing a manner. Higham v. Ridgway (5) declares the law on the point at issue. The more we look at that case, the more clearly must we come to two conclusions. In the first place we must see that the evidence there was admitted, not because the subject-matter of the declaration was within the peculiar knowledge of the party

- A making the declaration, but that it was a declaration made against an interest of a very specific nature, viz., a pecuniary interest. I may further say, that one of the learned judges who is now present to assist your Lordships, WILLIAMS, J., was a counsel in that very case, and argued it with MR. SERJEANT MANLEY in 1808 against the admission of the evidence, and he remembers perfectly well that the evidence was received on the express and specific ground that it was an entry against the
- B pecuniary interest of the party. Another conclusion to which we must come is that, considering the nature and tendencies of such evidence unless properly restricted, we ought to be careful and cautious of extending the rule as laid down in Higham v. Ridgway (5), beyond the limits settled by that case. To say, if a man should confess a felony for which he would be liable to prosecution, that, therefore, the instant the grave closes over him, all that was said by him is to be taken as evidence in every
- C action and prosecution against another person, is one of the most monstrous and untenable propositions that can be advanced. LORD KENYON never could have entertained the opinion or held the doctrine imputed to him in Standen v. Standen (6). The law in Higham v. Ridgway (5) has been carried far enough, although not too far. The rule, as understood now is that the only declarations of deceased persons receivable in evidence are those made against the proprietary or pecuniary
- D interest of the party making them when the subject-matter of such declarations is within the peculiar knowledge of the party so making them.

- LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I entirely agree with what has fallen from my noble and learned friends. I take the rule in Higham v. Ridgway (5) to be as my noble and learned friend has just stated it. With regard to declarations made by persons
- E in extremis, supposing all necessary matters concurred such as actual danger, death following it, and a full apprehension, at the time, of the danger and of death, such declarations can be received in evidence, but all these things must concur to render such declarations admissible. Such evidence, however, ought to be received with caution, because it is subject to no cross-examination. As to Standen v. Standen (6), I agree with my noble and learned friend, that it is doubtful whether
- F LORD KENYON ever could have admitted the evidence in the way there described, but, even if he did, it must be recollected that that was an issue from the Court of Chancery in the trial of which the rules of evidence are sometimes relaxed as the whole proceeding is one simply for the information of that court. The witness there came to bastardise his own issue; he was discredited, and the verdict was against him. It never, therefore, became necessary to discuss the propriety of what had
- G been done, but that case has never since been acted on, and to me it seems to involve a very dangerous principle of law.

LORD COTTENHAM.—I beg simply to express my concurrence in what has already been said by the noble and learned Lords who have preceded me.

- H LORD CAMPBELL.—By the law of England the declarations of deceased persons are not generally admissible unless they are against the pecuniary interest of the party making them. There are two exceptions: first, where a declaration by word of mouth or by writing is made in the course of the business of the individual making it; there it may be received in evidence, though it is not against his interest: Doe d. Patteshall v. Turford (7). The service of a notice may thus be
- I proved, and, in like manner, an entry by a notary's clerk that he had presented a bill, for that is in the ordinary discharge of his duty. But as to the point of interest, I have always understood the rule to be that the declaration, to be admissible, must have been one which was contrary to the interests of the party making it, in a pecuniary point of view, and, with the exception of Standen v. Standen (6), I do not know any case which appears to break in upon that principle. I think it would lead to most inconvenient consequences, both to individuals and to the public, if we were to say that the apprehension of a criminal prosecution was an interest which ought to let in such declarations in evidence. But even if such a rule did exist, it would not permit the learned counsel here to bring in the statements of Mr. Gunn, for how are your Lordships to know what state Mr. Gunn's mind was in when he made the declarations? He might have believed that the marriage having been celebrated abroad, the provisions of the Royal Marriages Act did not extend to it, and that he was in no danger whatever from what he had done. A

LORD LANGDALE, M.R.—Lest it should be supposed that there is any difference of opinion on this point, I beg to say that I fully concur with the noble and learned Lords who have preceded me. B

The declarations tendered were rejected.

The Right Rev. Nicholas Wiseman, D.D., having been called, and having begun to give his evidence on the law at Rome on the subject of marriage, referred, while doing so, to a work which was lying by him. This was noticed. C

LORD BROUGHAM (to counsel).—You had better state to the witness that he may refresh his recollection by referring to authorities on the matter of law to which his evidence is addressed.

LORD LYNTHURST, L.C.—Do so. The witness may thus correct and confirm his recollection of the law, though he is the person to tell us what it is. D

LORD CAMPBELL.—The most authoritative form of getting at foreign law is to have the book which lays down the law. Thus we have had the CODE NAPOLEON in our courts. It is better than to examine a witness, whose memory may be defective, and who may have a bias influencing his mind upon the law. E

LORD BROUGHAM.—My opinion entirely concurs with that of the Lord Chancellor. The witness may refer to the sources of his knowledge, but it is perfectly clear that the proper mode of proving a foreign law is not by showing to the House the book of the law, for the House has not organs to know and to deal with the text of that law, and, therefore, requires the assistance of a lawyer who knows how to interpret it. If the CODE NAPOLEON was before a French court, that court would know how to deal with and construe its provisions; but in England we have no such knowledge, and the English judges must, therefore, have the assistance of foreign lawyers. This was fully considered in Dalrymple v. Dalrymple (8), in which the opinion of the Scottish lawyers was taken as a matter of fact, they being examined upon oath. In those opinions they referred to Scottish statutes and Scottish law-books. It was agreed on all hands, that that which was there in evidence were not the mere statements of foreign text-writers, but the opinions of skilful and scientific men who were examined on oath. F

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—There does not appear to be, in fact, any real difference of opinion upon this point. There is no question raised here as to any exclusive mode of getting at this evidence, for we have both the materials of knowledge offered to us. We have the witness, and he states the law, which he says is correctly laid down in these books. The books are produced, but the witness describes them as authoritative, and explains them by his knowledge of the actual practice of the law. A skilful and scientific man must state what the law is, but may refer to books and statutes to assist him in doing so. G H

LORD CAMPBELL.—I entirely concur with the law as laid down by the noble and learned Lord who has just spoken. Foreign law is a matter of fact to be proved by evidence. You call witnesses to prove that fact; you ask the witness what the law is. He may from his recollection, or on producing and referring to books, say what it is, or that it is found correctly stated in such a book. So likewise he may take the book to refresh his memory. I

LORD LANGDALE, M.R.—The question here is how a witness as to what is foreign law is to be examined; in what form and manner he is to give his testimony.

A Foreign law is, in the courts of this country, a matter of fact. A witness more or less skilled in it, is called in to depose to it. He may state what it is from his own knowledge, or assist his knowledge by reference to books and authorities that are within his reach. He may refer to textbooks, or to books of decisions, and so render his knowledge more accurate than before.

B The witness went on to state what was the law of Rome, and what the practice of the Roman courts, on the subjects of marriage generally, and of marriages between Protestants in particular.

The following question was put to the judges on the construction of the Royal Marriages Act:

C "Evidence being offered of a marriage solemnised at Rome in the year 1793 by an English priest, according to the rites of the church of England, between A.B., a son of his Majesty King George III, and C.D., a British subject, without the previous consent of his said Majesty, assuming such evidence to have been sufficient to establish a valid marriage between A.B. and C.D. independently of the provisions of the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, would it be sufficient, having regard to that statute, to establish a valid marriage in a suit, in which the eldest son of A.B. claims lands in England, as heir of A.B., by virtue of such alleged marriage?"

D The judges requested time to consider the question, which was granted.

July 9, 1844. TINDAL, C.J., read the following opinion of the judges.—
I am requested by my brethren to inform your Lordships, that it is the unanimous
E opinion of all the judges who have heard the argument in this case that, assuming the evidence given to have been sufficient to establish a valid marriage between A.B. and C.D. independently of the provisions of the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, it is not sufficient, having regard to that statute, to establish a valid marriage in a suit, in which the eldest son of A.B. claims lands in England, as heir of A.B., by virtue of such alleged marriage.

F The question turns entirely upon the legal construction of that statute, and is shortly this—whether, to bring a marriage within the prohibition of that statute, it is necessary that it should have been contracted within the realm of England, or whether the statute extends to prohibit and to annul marriages, wherever the same be contracted or solemnised, either within the realm of England or without?

G It is scarcely necessary to observe, that as A.B. was a son of his late Majesty King George III, and the statute applies to a descendant of the body of his late Majesty King George II, not being the issue of any princess married into a foreign family, A.B. falls precisely within the class or description of persons with respect to whose marriage the statute intends to legislate, and that, as he falls within that description or class, the statute may be considered as if it had been passed with respect to him personally and individually—as if it had enacted in express
H terms "that A.B. shall not be capable of contracting matrimony without the previous consent of the reigning Sovereign, signified under the Great Seal, and declared in Council," and again, "that the marriage of A.B., without such consent first had and obtained, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes."

I The only rule for the construction of Acts of Parliament is that they should be construed according to the intent of the Parliament which passed the Act. If the words of the statute are in themselves precise and unambiguous, then no more can be necessary than to expound those words in their natural and ordinary sense. The words themselves alone do, in such case, best declare the intention of the lawgiver. But if any doubt arises from the terms employed by the legislature, it has always been held a safe means of collecting the intention to call in aid the ground and cause of making the statute, and to have recourse to the preamble, which, according to DYER, C.J., [in Stowel v. Lord Zouch (1)] is "a key to open the minds of the makers of the Act, and the mischiefs which they intended to redress."

Looking to all these grounds of interpretation, we think they concur, in the present instance, in demanding that construction of the statute at which we have arrived. For, in the first place, the words of the statute itself appear to us to be free from ambiguity. The prohibitory words of it are general—that no one of the persons therein described “shall be capable of contracting matrimony without the previous consent of His Majesty.” And again: A

“... every marriage or matrimonial contract of any such descendant without such consent first had and obtained shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.” B

The statute does not enact an incapacity to contract matrimony within one particular country and district or another; it enacts an incapacity to contract matrimony generally, and in the abstract. It is an incapacity attaching itself to the person of A.B., which he carries with him wherever he goes. But as a marriage once duly contracted in any country will be a valid marriage all the world over, the incapacity to contract a marriage at Rome is as clearly within the prohibitory words of the statute as the incapacity to contract in England. So again, as to the second or annulling branch of the enactment, that “every marriage without such consent shall be null and void,” the words employed are general, or, more properly, universal, and cannot be satisfied in their plain, literal, ordinary meaning, unless they are held to extend to all marriages in whatever part of the world they may have been contracted or celebrated. C

The words of s. 2 throw light upon and confirm the interpretation to be given to s. 1. By s. 2 the descendants of the body of George II, being above the age of 25 years, who shall persist in their resolution to contract a marriage disapproved of or dissented from by the King, upon giving notice to the Privy Council, are enabled, at any time from the expiration of twelve calendar months after such notice, to contract such marriage, and such marriage may be duly solemnised, without the previous consent of his Majesty, his heirs or successors. Such a marriage is declared to be good, as if the Act had never been made, unless both Houses of Parliament shall, before the expiration of the twelve months, expressly declare their disapprobation of the intended marriage. The words employed in this section are the same as in the first, “to contract a marriage,” and “marriage” generally, without any reference to the country wherein the marriage is contracted or solemnised. As no doubt could be entertained by any one but that a marriage, taking place with the due observance of the requisites of s. 2, would be held equally valid whether contracted and celebrated at Rome or in England; so we think it would be contrary to all established rules of construction if the very same words in s. 1 were to receive a different sense from those in s. 2, if it should be held that a marriage at Rome, contracted with reference to s. 2, is made valid, and at the same time a marriage at Rome is not prohibited under s. 1. It is scarcely supposable that the legislature should have provided the minute and laborious machinery of the second section, that it should have interposed such checks against a marriage without consent, and at the same time have rendered such a marriage ultimately valid in one given state of circumstances—if the party who is the subject of such legislation, by an easy journey, or a voyage of a few hours, could render all these provisions useless and set the statute at defiance by contracting a marriage abroad with whomever he thought proper. It is not unworthy of remark, while we are looking to the body of this Act in order to discover its interpretation, that the very exception from the prohibitory clause, of the issue of those princesses who have married or may marry into foreign families, affords some proof that marriages abroad could not have been out of the view or contemplation of the legislature at the time of passing the Act, as such marriages in all probability might not infrequently be celebrated out of England. D

It was contended in the course of the argument at your Lordships' Bar, that an Act of the English legislature can have no binding force beyond, or out of, the realm of England. If by this is meant only that it can have no obligatory force upon the subjects of another State, the position is no doubt correct in its full extent, E

A but it is equally certain that an Act of the legislature will bind the subjects of this realm, both within the kingdom and without, if such was its intention. Indeed it was admitted by the learned counsel for the claimant that, if there had been found in this statute the words "marriages within the realm of England or without," or any other words equipollent thereto, under such an enactment the capacity to contract a marriage at Rome would have been taken away, and the marriage there
B solemnised would have been made null and void. But if the words actually found in the Statute are comprehensive enough to include all marriages, as well those within the realm as without, as we think they are, and if, at the same time, the restraining the sense of those words to marriages within England must necessarily defeat the object and purpose of the Act, as we think it would, it seems to follow that the construction of the Act must be the same, whether those words are found within
C the statute or not. Surely, if the marriage of a descendant of George II, contracted or celebrated in Scotland or Ireland, or on the continent is to be held a marriage not prohibited by this Act, the statute itself may be considered as virtually and substantially a dead letter from the first day it was passed.

The object and purpose for which the Act was passed, and the mischief intended to be prevented thereby, are clear, and leave no doubt as to the proper construction
D of the Act. It was founded upon the policy and expediency which requires that no marriage of any branch of the Royal Family should be contracted, which might be detrimental to the interests of the State, either at home or abroad. The object declared by the preamble is "more effectually to guard the descendants of his late Majesty King George II . . . from marrying without the approbation of the reigning Sovereign"; and it also declares that

E "marriages in the Royal Family are of the highest importance to the State, and that, therefore, the kings of this realm have ever been entrusted with the care and approbation thereof."

But this object is frustrated, the mischief is remediless, and the power of the Sovereign nugatory, if a marriage, which in England would have been confessedly
F void, is to be held good and valid when celebrated out of the country.

It was argued on the part of the claimant, that, as it is directed in s. 1 of the Act that the consent under the Great Seal shall be set out in the licence and register of the marriage, and as this direction can only be applicable to the case of a marriage celebrated in this country, so the prohibition must be construed as confined to a marriage in this country only, and as not extending to a foreign
G marriage. But to this objection it appears to us to be a sufficient answer that the only words in that section that are essential to make the marriage a valid marriage are those which require "the previous consent of his Majesty . . . signified under the Great Seal, and declared in Council," and that the words which follow, directing such consent to be set out in the licence and register of the marriage, are, as the very words import, directory only, not essential, and are applicable to those cases
H alone where they can be applied, namely, to the case of a marriage celebrated in England by licence. For it would be impossible to contend, if the marriage of A.B. had been celebrated at Rome, with the previous consent of his Majesty King George III, signified under the Great Seal, and declared in Council, that such marriage would not have been good and valid to all intents and purposes although the observance of the direction that such consent should be inserted in the licence
I and register of the marriage had become, in that case, impracticable.

It was further contended in argument, that inasmuch as by s. 3 of the Act all persons who wilfully and knowingly presume to solemnise, or assist or be present at the celebration of any marriage, or at the making of any matrimonial contract, without such consent, shall incur the penalties of a praemunire [the penalty of praemunire has long been obsolete: see 10 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 568, note (o)], and as there is no provision made in this section for the trial and consequently the punishment of the offender where the offence shall be committed out of England, the necessary inference must be, that the statute itself does not extend to prohibit a marriage out of England, but we think the inference that the penal clause is itself defective in not making provision for the trial of British subjects when they violate the statute out of the realm is the more just and reasonable inference—not that we should refuse, on that account, to give the plain words of the statute their necessary force, and hold the enactment itself to be substantially useless and inoperative. We, therefore, think, for the reasons humbly submitted to your Lordships, that the eldest son of A.B., under the circumstances stated in your Lordships' question, and regard being had to the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, could not make out a good title, as heir to A.B., to the lands sought to be recovered.

LORD LYNTHURST, L.C.—I do not entertain the slightest doubt of the sufficiency of the evidence to establish the marriage as a marriage in fact. By a "marriage in fact," I mean that I think the evidence is sufficient to show that these parties were married at Rome by a clergyman of the Church of England, in conformity with the rites and ceremonies of the English church. With regard to the evidence, as referred to by my noble and learned friend, that evidence is sufficient, as it at present stands, to show that this marriage would be a valid marriage of Protestants at Rome, according to the law of Rome. Whether such a marriage would be a valid marriage in this country for any purpose independently of the Royal Marriages Act, is a point upon which I give no opinion. I propose to resolve that it is the opinion of the committee that the claimant has not made out his claim.

LORD BROUGHAM.—In agreeing to the motion of my noble and learned friend, and in expressing my entire concurrence with the opinion of the learned judges, I do so upon the ground not only that the object of the Act is clear, but that the words of the Act are sufficient (for that is necessary also) to accomplish the manifest purpose of the Act. I say this because it is not a sufficient ground to hold that the purpose is clear, unless the words are sufficient to accomplish that purpose, though otherwise the Act might have been nugatory. It was so in the case of the Marriage Act, 1823. It was quite clear that that Act was intended to prevent minors from marrying without consent, unless with the publication of banns, and yet notwithstanding that, by going to Scotland, a very short journey, the parties intended to be affected by the Act, namely, wealthy persons, could easily accomplish the purpose, and defeat the Act. My opinion is that if that Act had used the same phraseology as this, and had rendered the parties incapable of contracting matrimony, we should never have heard of Compton v. Bearcroft (9), and Ilderton v. Ilderton (10). At all events, there is sufficient, to my mind, to stamp with perfect accuracy the opinions delivered by the learned judges. Parties are rendered incapable of contracting matrimony, and not merely, as in the case of Lord Hardwicke's Act [26 Geo. 2, c. 33: repealed by Marriage Act, 1823, itself repealed with savings by Marriage Act, 1949], the marriage rendered null and void. It, therefore, follows that a prince going abroad and contracting matrimony is, for all British purposes, with a view to the Crown and the rights of peerage, incapable of contracting matrimony, and any marriage so contracted is null and void.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—After the observations of my noble and learned friends, there does not appear to me to be any sufficient reason for postponing the decision on this claim. I am happy and much satisfied in being enabled to say that my opinion entirely agrees with that of your Lordships. I think the operative words of the Royal Marriages Act, taken alone, are perfectly clear to show that this is no marriage by the law of England.

LORD CAMPBELL.—I agree with my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, that, as the evidence now stands, there would be a marriage in fact, because the evidence that has been given to us of the Roman law, uncontradicted as it is, would prove that a marriage at Rome of English Protestants, contracted according to the rites of their own church, would be recognised as a marriage by the Roman law, and, therefore, would be a marriage all over the world. I own that that evidence rather surprised me. I had imagined that it was impossible there could be

A a valid marriage at Rome, between Protestants, by a Protestant clergyman, such as the Roman law would recognise. As the evidence stands at your Lordships' Bar, it would appear, however, that the Roman law would recognise such a marriage without the religious ceremonies required by the Romish church before the Council of Trent, namely, without the intervention of a priest, and would treat it as a marriage valid by the universal law of the church before the date of the decree of B that council, and it would appear that the decree of the Council of Trent respecting marriages was not meant to apply to the marriage of Protestants, who could not conform to it.

That, my Lords, I think is the universally prevailing opinion. But when we come to the Royal Marriages Act, it seems to me that there is an insuperable bar to the validity of this marriage. The elaborate opinion that has been delivered by C the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas (TINDAL, C.J.) appears to me to have exhausted entirely this part of the subject. It accords with the opinion I had originally formed. I kept my mind, however, entirely open till I had heard the arguments on both sides, and I now am confirmed in my previous opinion by the legal reasoning laid before us in the most admirable opinion we have this day D heard delivered by the Lord Chief Justice. I entirely concur with that opinion. I have no doubt that it is competent to the British legislature to pass a law making invalid the marriage of particular British subjects all over the world. I have no doubt that it was the object of that Act of Parliament to invalidate marriages of the descendants of George II (with the exception of the issue of princesses married or marrying into foreign royal families), without the consent of the Crown, wherever those marriages might be celebrated, and I am clearly of opinion that the intention E is sufficiently testified by the language which has been employed.

LORD COTTENHAM.—After the discussion which has taken place, I think it right to say that my opinion is formed entirely and exclusively upon the Royal Marriages Act. I entirely agree in the opinion which has been expressed by the learned judges, inasmuch as by the construction of the Royal Marriages Act, whether F the marriage would be valid by the law of Rome or not, it would not be valid by the law of this country. My opinion, therefore, is against the claim.

Resolved that the claimant had not made out his claim to be Duke of Sussex, Earl of Inverness, and Baron of Arklow.

Conflict of Laws—Marriage—Validity—Solemnisation in England—Both parties domiciled abroad—Formalities needed for valid marriage in foreign country not complied with—Recourse to English ceremony to evade foreign law.

A marriage duly solemnised in England in the manner prescribed by the law of England between parties of full age and capable of contracting according to English law is valid although the parties to the marriage, being foreigners, contracted it in England in order to evade the laws of the country to which they belonged and in which they were domiciled. An English court has jurisdiction to adjudicate on the validity or otherwise of such a marriage.

B Petition for a decree of nullity of marriage brought by Valérie Josephine Wilhelmine Simonin (falsely called Mallac), of Kingston, who, on or about June 21, 1854, went through a form or ceremony of marriage with Leon Mallac, of Paris, at the parish church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, London.

C The petitioner alleged that about two days after the ceremony of marriage, she and Mallac returned to Paris, but she did not cohabit with him, nor was the marriage ever consummated. The ceremony of marriage was had in contravention and evasion of the law of France regulating the marriage of domiciled French subjects contracted in foreign countries, and particularly in contravention and evasion of the provisions of arts. 170, 63, 148, 151 and 152 of the CODE CIVIL or CODE NAPOLÉON. The petitioner and Leon Mallac were native subjects of France, and were at the date of the ceremony of marriage domiciled in Paris, the petitioner then being about the age of twenty-two years, and Leon Mallac was about twenty-nine.

D On or about Dec. 1, 1854, the Civil Tribunal of the First Instance of the department of the Seine, sitting at Paris, at a public session of the first chamber of the tribunal, at the suit of the petitioner, Leon Mallac having been first duly summoned but not appearing, declared null and of no effect the pretended marriage of June 21, 1854, between Leon Mallac and the petitioner, and condemned Leon Mallac in the costs of the suit.

E The citation and copy petition were served personally on Leon Mallac at Naples. He put in no answer.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 26, 1860. CRESSWELL, J.O., read the following judgment of the court.—

F This was a petition for a decree of nullity of marriage. The case came on for hearing before my brothers CHANNELL and KEATING and myself, on Jan. 18, 1860, when the petitioner proved that she was of French origin, and in 1853 was residing in Paris with her mother, her father being then dead. In that year she became acquainted with Leon Mallac, also of French origin, who made an offer of marriage, which she accepted. In June, 1854, he proposed that they should come to England

G and be married in this country, assigning as a reason that if that were done his father would afterwards consent, and he would then marry her in France. The parties came to London, and were married in due form by licence on June 21, 1854, in the parish church of St. Martins-in-the-Fields. The marriage was not consummated, and the parties returned to Paris the next day, and went to the residence of the petitioner's mother, Leon Mallac occupying another part of the same building.

H The petitioner asked him to marry her in France; he did not do so, but said he would go to his own country and ask the consent of his father, who lived on the banks of the Garonne. He afterwards wrote to her a letter, refusing to marry in France, and admitting that he had broken his word. The petitioner then instituted a suit before the Civil Tribunal of the First Instance of the Seine to procure a decree of nullity of the pretended marriage; and on Dec. 1, 1854, a decree was made.

I of which the original and a translation were put in evidence.

The grounds on which that decree was made are stated in the following words in the translation :

"The court decides by default against Leon Mallac, who did not appear, nor anyone for him, although duly called, as follows: Considering in law that, by the words of art. 170 of the CODE NAPOLÉON, when a marriage between French subjects has been celebrated in foreign countries, it must have been preceded by publication in France prescribed by the law, and that there must not have been any contravention of the provisions of arts. 144 and following of the CODE NAPOLÉON; considering that the nullity provided for by art. 170 is not absolute, but ought to be pronounced when an omission of formalities has taken place with the formal intention to elude the law, it being in the province of the tribunal to appreciate the circumstances thereof; considering in fact that Leon Mallac and Valérie Simonin, artist of the Théâtre Français, both being French subjects, and domiciled in Paris, have contracted marriage in London, on June 22, 1854, before a minister of the Protestant Church, in the presence of witnesses; considering that this marriage was celebrated without the parties having obtained or sought the consent of their parents, and without having been preceded in France by the publications prescribed by art. 63 of the CODE NAPOLÉON; considering that the married couple having resided in Paris, only went momentarily to England for the purpose of contracting marriage there, and returned to France directly after the celebration; considering that from this it is evident that they acted in this manner with the formal intention of evading the prescriptions of the French law; considering that Valérie Simonin states distinctly that this marriage was not followed by any consummation or cohabitation between the parties, and that that assertion is not contradicted by Leon Mallac; considering that under these circumstances the marriage contracted in London, on June 22, 1854, between Leon Mallac and Valérie Simonin, cannot be recognised as valid and regular; on these grounds it declares the pretended marriage of June 22, 1854, between Leon Mallac and Valérie Simonin null and void . . ."

In May, 1857, the petitioner and her mother came to England, and they have resided here from that time, and the petitioner stated that she had no intention to return to France, and had no property there.

A witness, Auguste Noël, called to prove the law of France as applicable to the case, stated that he had acted as a notary public in Paris, and in order to do so it was necessary that he should be acquainted with the law of marriage in France. He deposed that art. 63 of the CODE NAPOLÉON as to publication of banns of marriage is part of the existing law of France, and was so in 1854; that art. 170 and arts. 151-154 are part of the law of France, and were so in 1854; that those articles do not prohibit the marriage, but only postpone it, and if the form prescribed is followed, and the time prescribed has elapsed, the parties may marry without consent; that a marriage in a foreign land as mentioned in art. 170, without attention to arts. 144 and 164 therein referred to, is good or bad according as the French tribunal before whom the question is raised may think the parties went abroad to marry in fraud of the law of France or not; that if a Frenchman was married here in England without consent, and consent afterwards given in France, that would render the marriage valid, whatever were the formalities omitted; that art. 184 of the CODE is part of the law of France, and was so in 1854; that the prescription therein mentioned would run in the case of a daughter from the age of twenty-one, and of a son from the age of twenty-five; that if a daughter between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-five allows a year to elapse without impeaching the marriage, this is a statute of limitations, and she cannot impeach it afterwards.

This state of facts presented two very important questions for our consideration: first, whether the court has any jurisdiction over Leon Mallac, the party cited; and, secondly, assuming that such jurisdiction exists, whether, according to the law of this country, the marriage solemnised is to be held null and void. We had the advantage of a learned argument on the part of the petitioner, and feel that the responsibility cast upon the court is greatly increased by the want of any such assistance on the other side. The argument in favour of the jurisdiction was rested on the ground, (i) that the contract was made in England and that the court is called upon for its decision with regard to the effect of a civil and religious English contract, celebrated under an English statute, the Marriage Act, 1823 [repealed with Savings by Marriage Act, 1949], and that the tribunals loci contractus have, generally speaking, consueance of the contract; (ii) that England is now the domicil

A of the petitioner, but that objection begs the main question in dispute, for, if the marriage be valid, it is not her domicile; (iii) that the respondent was personally served with the citation and petition, and has not appeared to contest the jurisdiction of the court. Section 42 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 [see now 12 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 332], removes all objection on the ground of the citation having been served without Her Majesty's dominions, but, in our opinion, B would not of itself suffice to give to the court authority to decide upon the rights of a party not otherwise subject to its jurisdiction.

This question, therefore, depends upon the first proposition, that the parties, by professing to enter into a contract in England, mutually gave to each other the right to have the force and effect of that contract determined by an English tribunal. HUBER, 65, tit. 1, De Foro Competente, s. 5, says :

C "Sequitur causa fori tertia quam rem gestam esse diximus eamque vel e contractu vel e delicto admissio."

In another place he adds, "Si reus illic haberi posse," etc. The same doctrine is to be found in JOHN VOET, BOULENOIS, DONELLUS and STORY. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 [repealed by Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, D 1883], s. 19, which allows a writ of summons to be issued against a person residing out of the jurisdiction and not being a British subject, and proceedings to be had thereon, notice of such writ having been served on the party, appears to have been founded on this principle; and s. 42 of the Act of 1857 already adverted to, removes all difficulty as to service of process, although the party cited is a foreigner by origin and domicile. There is nothing contrary to natural justice in calling upon E him to have the validity or invalidity of a supposed contract ascertained and determined by the tribunal of the country where it was entered into by him, for, according to LORD STOWELL, in Dalrymple v. Dalrymple (1) (2 Hag. Con. at p. 61), it is an indisputable rule of law, as exercised in all civilised countries, that a man who contracts in a country engages for a competent knowledge of the law of contract in that country. If he rashly presumes to contract without such knowledge, he F must take the inconveniences resulting from such ignorance upon himself, and not attempt to throw them upon the other party. We think, therefore, that this court is competent to entertain the present suit, and to adjudicate upon the petition presented by the party calling herself Valérie Simonin, which prays the court to decree that the pretended form or ceremony of marriage had between her and Leon Mallac was and is void, and of no effect in law whatsoever.

G This, which is the second question to be determined, is no doubt of the gravest importance, and, as far as this court has been able to ascertain, primae impressionis. No decision on the point was cited to us by the learned advocate for the petitioner, and we have not had the benefit of any other diligence save our own in the attempt to discover precedents for our guidance. The question is this—whether a marriage duly solemnised in England in the manner prescribed by the law of England between H parties of full age and capable of contracting according to that law is to be held null and void because the parties to that marriage, being foreigners, contracted it in England in order to evade the laws of the country to which they belonged and in which they were domiciled. It may, indeed, be doubted whether the evidence of the petitioner established the intention to evade the law of France, and whether that which the witness Auguste Noel called a statute of limitation, viz., art. 183 of the I CODE NAPOLÉON, did or did not operate to bar the right of the petitioner to institute this proceeding four years after the marriage was solemnised, but we pass over those points in order to deal with the broad and important question that has been raised.

It was contended that, the parties being French, the law of that country affixed to them an incapacity to contract marriage without attending to the formalities prescribed, and that such incapacity was a personal status which travelled with them everywhere and rendered them incapable of making a valid contract in any other country. But, according to the evidence, such incapacity to contract was, not absolute, but conditional only, and a contract made by them would be good unless they came here with the intention to evade the law of France. So a contract made here would be unimpeachable if ratified by the subsequent assent of the parents, and a contract made here would be perfectly valid unless impeached within a certain time, and, therefore, a marriage contracted between a man and woman of the respective ages of twenty-five and twenty-one, without attending to the formalities prescribed by the CODE NAPOLÉON, arts. 151, 152, 153 and 154, may receive a different consideration from one absolutely prohibited by art. 148, by parties respectively under those ages. A B

Taking the decree of the French court in the suit there instituted as evidence that by the law of France this marriage was void, we again come to the broad question: Is it to be judged of here by the law of England or the law of France? In general the personal competency or incompetency of individuals to contract has been held to depend upon the law of the place where the contract is made. It was and is contended, however, that that rule does not extend to contracts of marriage, but that parties are, with reference to them, bound by the law of their domicile. This question, of so much importance in all civilised communities, has been largely discussed by jurists of all nations, but they all apply their observations to controversies arising, not in the countries where the marriage was celebrated, but in other countries where it is brought in dispute and of which the parties were domiciled subjects. That a marriage, good by the law of the country where solemnised, should be held good in all other countries, and the converse, is strongly maintained as a general rule by nearly all writers on international law. But, according to the same authorities, it is subject to some few exceptions, viz., marriages involving polygamy and incest; those positively prohibited by the public law of a country from motives of policy, e.g., by our Royal Marriages Act, 1772. STORY, in his CONFLICT OF LAWS, s. 113 a, mentions a third exception: C D E

“Those celebrated in foreign countries by subjects entitling themselves under special circumstances to the benefit of the laws of their own country.”

In several instances, learned judges presiding in our ecclesiastical courts have stated the general rule, without mentioning the exceptions, whence it has sometimes been contended that they meant to controvert their existence. But, inasmuch as none of the cases referred to fell within the exceptions above mentioned, it cannot justly be inferred that those learned persons intended their words to bear so extensive a meaning, for they would hardly have repudiated the doctrine of several learned writers, whose works are always received as worthy of great attention, without condescending to advert to it in terms, and assigning some reasons for dissenting from it. F G

In addition to the writings of jurists as to the existence of such a general rule by the law of all civilised nations, we find that in several cases it has been adopted by the courts of this country as the ground of their decisions. I believe the earliest of them was Scrimshire v. Scrimshire (2) decided by SIR EDWARD SIMPSON in 1752, for that learned judge then said it was a case primae impressionis. The judgment is of great value, from the full manner in which he dealt with the principles on which the court should proceed in adjudicating upon such cases. The parties were British subjects, domiciled in England; it was a suit for restitution of conjugal rights. The respondent pleaded that the marriage was celebrated in France, set forth circumstances under which that celebration took place, and averred that by the laws of France the marriage was null and void. SIR EDWARD SIMPSON, after disposing of one or two preliminary points, observed (2 Hag. Con. at pp. 398, 399): H I

“The general questions are two: first, whether there be full and legal proof that the parties did mutually, freely and voluntarily celebrate marriage in such manner as the laws of this country would deem to constitute marriage, if there was nothing else in the case but a question on the fact of the marriage; secondly, whether, if the fact of the marriage should be proved, this marriage can by the laws of this country be effectuated and pronounced to be good, being

A solemnised in France, where by law it is null and void, to all intents and purposes? For it seemed to be admitted in the argument that the law was so, but insisted that it ought not to be a rule of determination in this cause."

The first point he determined in the affirmative, and would have held the marriage valid had it been agreeable to the laws of France, where it was celebrated. He continues (ibid. at pp. 405 and 407):

B "But the great difficulty arises on the second question, from the marriage being celebrated in France, where such marriage is null by the laws of France . . . The only question before me is, whether this is a good or bad marriage by the laws of England; and I am inclined to think that it is not good. On this point I apprehend that it is the law of this country to take notice of the laws of France, or of any foreign country, in determining upon marriages of this kind.

C The question being in substance this—whether, by the law of this country, marriage contracts are not to be deemed good or bad according to the laws of the country in which they are formed, and whether they are not to be construed by that law."

D He then quotes several passages from SANCHEZ, J. VOET and others, showing that, if subjects of a country where clandestine marriages are prohibited go to another country where there is no such prohibition, and celebrate a clandestine marriage there, it is to be held good; and the converse is established by the same authorities. He sums up the effect of the books referred to in these words:

E "These authorities fully show that all contracts are to be considered according to the laws of the country where they are made, and the practice of civilised countries has been conformable to this doctrine, and by the common consent of nations has been so received."

F In many instances judges have used similar language with reference to cases where the form and ceremonial of the marriage were alone in question; and it can hardly, in such cases, be presumed that they intended their words to bear a more extensive sense than was necessary for the question then before them; but the sense ascribed by SIR EDWARD SIMPSON to these passages extends to the clandestine character of the marriage, and not merely to the form of the contract or ceremonial. He then explains, in the clearest manner, the principle on which courts have proceeded in holding that marriages are to be considered according to the law of the country in which they are celebrated (ibid. at p. 417):

G "All nations allow marriage contracts, they are juris gentium, and the subjects of all nations are equally concerned in them; and from the infinite mischief and confusion which must necessarily arise to the subjects of all nations with respect to legitimacy, successions and other rights, if the respective laws of different countries were only to be observed as to marriages contracted by the subjects of those countries abroad, all nations have consented, or must be presumed to consent, for the common benefit and advantage, that such marriages should be good or not according to the laws of the country where they are made. It is of equal consequence to all that one rule in these cases should be observed by all countries, that is the law where the contract is made. By observing this law no inconvenience can arise, but infinite mischief will ensue if it is not."

H

I The same rule was recognised and made the ground of the judgment of SIR W. WYNNE, in Middleton v. Janverin (3); nor is their reasoning weakened by the fact that certain exceptions out of that rule have been generally recognised, viz., where marriages deemed contrary to the law of religion and morality, and contrary to the settled policy of a nation, have been contracted abroad and held void in the country of which the parties were domiciled subjects, and where such a marriage would not be allowed. It is very remarkable that neither in the writings of jurists nor in the arguments of counsel, nor in the judgments delivered in the courts of justice, is any case quoted or suggestion offered to establish the proposition that the tribunals of a country where a marriage has been solemnised in conformity with the laws of that country should hold it void because the parties to the contract were the domiciled subjects of another country where such a marriage would not be allowed. No such argument has been advanced, even in the case of marriages deemed to be incestuous. There is a passage in HUBER PRAELECTIONES JURIS CIVILIS, lib. 1 tit. 3, "De Conflictu Legum," on this subject, which ought to be noticed. After discussing contracts made in foreign countries, in s. 8, he proceeds:

"Matrimonium pertinet etiam ad has regulas, si licitum est eo loco ubi contractum et celebratum est ubique validum erit affectumque habebit sub eadem exceptione prejudicii aliis non creandi, cui licet addere si exempli nimis sit abominandi, ut si incestum juris gentium in secundo gradu contingeret alicubi esse permissum; quod vix est ut usu veniri possit."

He proceeds to say that, if parties go to a country where such a marriage is tolerated and celebrate it there and return to their own country, it will not be recognised:

"Quia sic jus nostrum pessimis exemplis eluderetur, eoque pertinet haec observatio; sæpe fit ut adolescentes sub curatoribus agentes, furtivos amores nuptiis conglutinare cupientes abeant in Trisiam Orientalem aliave loca in quibus curatorum consensus ad matrimonium non requiretur juxta leges Romanas, quæ apud nos hæc parte cessant. Celebrant ibi matrimonium et mox redeunt in patriam. Ego ita existimo hanc rem manifeste pertinere ad eversionem juris nostri ac ideo non esse magistratus hic obligatos e jure gentium ejusmodi nuptias agnoscere et ratas habere; multoque magis statuendum et eos contra jus gentium facere videri qui civibus alieni imperii suâ facilitate jus patriis legibus contrarium scientes volentes impertiuntur."

This passage is remarkable. HUBER discusses the two exceptions out of the general rule that marriages good where celebrated are by the law of nations to be acknowledged everywhere—incestuous marriages and marriages of minors without consent (curatorum) celebrated in countries whither they have gone for the purpose of evading the laws of the country of their domicile—and he does not suggest the slightest doubt as to either class being held good in the country where solemnised, but, with reference to the second class, he vindicates the country of the domicile against the charge of violating the laws of nations by refusing to recognise them. STORY is, I believe, the only writer who has expressed an opinion on this point, and he, after mentioning that France has ventured on the doctrine that the marriages of Frenchmen under such circumstances shall not be deemed valid, adds (CONFLICT OF LAWS, s. 90):

"There can be little doubt that foreign countries where such marriages are celebrated will follow their own law, and disregard that of France."

The question appears to have occurred to LORD MEADOWBANK, a judge of great eminence, for in the note of his opinion annexed to his interlocutor of remit in Gordon v. Pye (4), he puts this question (Ferg. at p. 361):

"Or would a marriage here be declared void because the parties were domiciled in England, and minors when they married here, and of course incapable by the law of the country of contracting marriage?"

plainly intimating his own opinion that it would not. In this country marriages have been solemnly recognised as valid, although celebrated in Scotland between English domiciled minors without the consent required by the Marriage Act, 1753, 26 Geo. 2, c. 33 [repealed by Marriage Act, 1823], to which country they had resorted for the purpose of evading the operation of that Act. I allude to Compton v. Bearcroft (5) in a note to the report of Middleton v. Janverin (3).

The libel in that case is set out, in which the minority of the lady, the want of consent, the English domicile, and the Marriage Act, 1753, were pleaded, and it was alleged that the parties were married in Dumfries merely to evade the laws of this country, and returned to England the same day. The prayer was "that the mar-

A riage might be declared null and void, pursuant to the said Act for clandestine marriages." The libel was rejected. The court, therefore, must have held that if all the matters alleged were proved, they would not supply a ground for declaring the marriage null. It has been said that the parties did not in that case evade the Marriage Act, 1753, for that it contains an express exception of marriages solemnised in Scotland. It is true that marriages of minors in Scotland without consent are not prohibited by the Act, and, therefore, they cannot be said to be contrary to the law of England, but there can be no doubt that the parties went to Scotland to evade the operation of the law which was established in England. Compton v. Bearcroft (5) is, therefore, an authority to this extent, that a marriage contracted by English domiciled subjects abroad, where it is not prohibited by English law, will not be held bad because the parties have gone thither to evade the necessity of complying with certain conditions that would have been imposed upon them in England.

The French tribunal in the present case appears to have held the marriage null and void, not because it was absolutely prohibited by the law of France, but because the parties contracted it in England with the formal intention of evading the prescriptions of the French law. Every nation has a right to impose on its own subjects restrictions and prohibitions as to entering into marriage contracts, either within or without its own territories, and if its subjects sustain hardships in consequence of those restrictions, their own nation only must bear the blame; but what right has one independent nation to call upon any other nation equally independent to surrender its own laws in order to give effect to such restrictions and prohibitions? If there be any such right it must be found in the law of nations, that law

Which would be for the common benefit and advantage in such cases as the present, the observance of the law of the country where the marriage is celebrated, or of a foreign country? Parties contracting in any country are to be assumed to know, or to take the responsibility of not knowing, the law of that country. The law of France is equally stringent whether both parties are French, or one only. Assume, then, that a French subject comes to England and there marries without consent a subject of another foreign country by the laws of which such a marriage would be valid. Which law is to prevail? To which country is an English tribunal to pay the compliment of adopting its law? As far as the law of nations is concerned, each must have an equal right to claim respect for its laws. Both cannot be observed. Would it not then be more just, and, therefore, more for the interest of all, that the law of that country should prevail which both are presumed to know and to agree to be bound by? Again, assume that one of the parties is English, would not an English subject have as strong a claim to the benefit of English law as a foreigner to the benefit of foreign law?

H But it may be said that in the case now before the court both parties are French, and, therefore, no such difficulty can arise. That is true; but if once the principle of surrendering our own law to that of a foreign country is recognised, it must be followed out to all its consequences. The cases put are, therefore, a fair test as to the possibility of maintaining that by any comitas or jus gentium this court is bound to adopt the law of France as its guide. HUBER, indeed, in the passage cited, after vindicating the refusal to acknowledge a marriage solemnised abroad between parties who have gone there to evade the laws of their own country, proceeds:

"Multoque magis statuendum est eos contra jus gentium facere videri qui civibus alieni imperii suâ facilitate jus patriis legibus contrarium scientes volentes impertiuntur."

It is somewhat difficult to ascertain what HUBER would require to be done by foreigners in order that they may be exempted from his reproach. He assumes that they are scientes. Is it intended that they are to inquire and ascertain whether the law of any foreign nation will be evaded if the proposed marriage is solemnised? A Is the domicile of the parties and the law prevailing there to be investigated? Are the parties to be called upon to prove their ages, consent of certain relations, or the non-existence of certain relations? or that they have not come to this country to evade the laws of their own? Are the clergy of this country to be deemed scientes that a foreign law is about to be evaded unless they have proof to the contrary? Unless that proposition can be established, the reproach of B violating the law of nations cannot attach to this country if such marriages are here celebrated.

The great importance of having some one certain rule applicable to all cases; the difficulty, not to say impossibility, of having any rule applicable to all cases, save that the law of the country where a marriage is solemnised shall in that country at least decide whether it is valid or invalid; the absence of any judicial decision or C dictum, or of even any opposite opinion of any writer of authority on the law of nations, have led us to the conclusion that we ought not to found our judgment in this case on any other rule than the law of England as prevailing among English subjects. France may make laws for her own subjects, and impose on them all the consequences, good or evil, that result from those laws; but England also may make D laws for the regulation of all matters within her own territory. Either nation may refuse to surrender its own laws to those of the other, and if either is guilty of any breach of the comitas or jus gentium, that reproach should attach to the nation whose laws are least calculated to ensure the common benefit and advantage of all.
For these reasons we feel bound to dismiss this petition. It may be unfortunate for the petitioner that she should be held a wife in England and not so in France.
If she had remained in her own country, she might have enjoyed there the freedom E conferred upon her by a French tribunal; having elected England as her residence, she must be contented to take English law as she finds it, and to be treated as bound by the contract which she there made. The novelty and importance of the question has cast upon the court much anxiety, but from some portion of it we are relieved by the consideration that, if our judgment is wrong, it may be corrected F by the highest tribunal in this country.

Petition dismissed.

Water Supply—Rights of undertakers—Underground percolating water—Diversion from neighbouring land.

C

The right to the enjoyment of a natural stream of water on the surface ex jure naturae belongs to the proprietor of the adjoining lands as a natural incident to the property through which it passes, and he is entitled to the benefit of it as he is to all the other natural advantages belonging to the land of which he is the owner. He has the right to have it come to him in its natural state, in flow, quantity, and quality, and to go from him without obstruction, upon the same principle as that on which he is entitled to the support of his neighbours' soil for his own in its natural state. His right in no way depends on prescription or the presumed grant of his neighbours.

D

These principles, however, are not applicable to water percolating through underground strata, which has no certain course and no defined limit, but oozes through the soil in every direction in which the rain penetrates. There is no difficulty in determining the rights of the different proprietors to the usufruct of water in a running stream, but the right to percolating underground water is necessarily of a very uncertain description. The owner of land under which there is water which is not in a known and defined channel can appropriate that water even though in so doing he deprives an adjacent landowner of water which he has enjoyed for many years.

This is so whether the diversion of the water is caused by the action of a private person in, e.g., sinking a well for his domestic use, or by the action of a public authority in taking the water from a large area of land owned by them and applying it to the use of the residents of that area.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reported 2 H. & N. 168, in an action brought by the appellant, a mill owner, against the respondents, the clerk and members of the Local Board of Health, Croydon, Surrey, for damage alleged to have been done by the respondents under the authority of the board to an ancient stream and mill of the appellant by abstracting therefrom, by means of a well, the underground water which would otherwise have flowed into and supplied such stream. H

The appellant, Chasemore, was the occupier of an ancient mill on the river Wandle, called Wandle Mill, situated about a mile from Croydon. He and his predecessors had been accustomed for sixty years and upwards to use and enjoy the flow of the river for the purpose of working and using the mill. The river had always been fed and supplied above the mill by (among other sources) the rainfall of a district of many thousand acres in extent, comprising the town of Croydon and its vicinity. Large quantities of this water sank into the upper ground to various depths, and then flowed and percolated through the strata towards and into the river Wandle (if not interfered with), in some instances rising to the surface as springs, and then flowing as little surface streams into the river, and in other instances finding their whole way underground into the river. The precise lines and courses in which the underground runlets and particles of water so found their way underground into the river varied continually and infinitely with the shiftings I

A and variations in the soil which occurred from natural causes, but the general flow of large quantities of water to the river Wandle was as described, and if they were not interfered with or intercepted they formed considerable sources of supply to the river, as well above as below the mill. It was impossible to know beforehand the precise or complete effect which the sinking of a new well and pumping from it in any part of the district above described might have upon springs or streams

B in the vicinity; the effect might be instantly sensible and considerable, or for a long time no sensible effect might appear; but the natural effect of abstracting a large quantity of water at any spot of the district was to diminish the quantity at every other spot throughout the district, though the amount of diminution at particular spots might be infinitesimally small, and the natural effect to be reasonably expected from sinking a new well in such a district, and from continually, or almost

C continually, pumping thence large quantities of water for a long time, must be the sensible diminution of the water supply of springs and streams in the vicinity. This description applied to the district in question, not merely at the time of the action, but for sixty years and upwards before the works and acts of the local board of health.

The local board of health for the town of Croydon was constituted under the

D Public Health Acts. In 1851 the board, for the purpose of supplying the town of Croydon with water and for other sanitary purposes, sunk a large well to the depth of seventy-four feet in a piece of land belonging to them in the town of Croydon. They also erected pumps and steam-engines on their ground and pumped water from the well into a reservoir and pipes for the supply of the town. The amount of water pumped and taken by them from the well during the period of six calendar months

E from Aug. 16, 1853, to Feb. 16, 1854, was between 500,000 and 600,000 gallons daily. Part of this water, so pumped and taken by them from the well, was water then flowing and finding its way underground through the strata towards the river Wandle, and, if not intercepted by the operation of the well and pumping, would have found its way into the river Wandle, above the appellant's mill and would have been serviceable for the working of the mill, but, by the operation of the well

F and pumping, it was drawn away into the well and thence pumped up and taken by the board. The board throughout all their acts and works was actuated by no malice against the appellant or anyone else, and they did not intend in any way to diminish the quantity of water in the river Wandle, or to injure any person interested in the use of the river, but the board, at the time of their acts and works, had reasonable means of knowing the probable and natural effects thereof.

G The Court of Exchequer gave judgment in favour of the respondents, without argument, on the authority of a previous decision in that court of Broadbent v. Ramsbotham (1). On appeal to the Court of Exchequer Chamber the decision of the Exchequer was confirmed, COLERIDGE, J., differing from the rest of the court. The appellant appealed to the House of Lords.

H Bovill, Q.C., Needham and Raymond for the appellant.
Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Q.C., and Miller for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments the House put the following question to the learned judges who attended, viz., WIGHTMAN, WILLIAMS, CROMPTON, JJ., and MARTIN, BRAMWELL and WATSON, BB.: Whether, under the circumstances stated, the Croydon Local Board of Health are legally liable to the action of the appellant

I for the abstraction of the water in the manner described? The learned judges later delivered their unanimous opinion by WIGHTMAN, J., answering the question submitted to them in the negative.

In the course of his judgment WIGHTMAN, J., said: The law respecting the right to water flowing in definite visible channels may be considered as pretty well settled by several modern decisions, and is very clearly enunciated in the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Embrey v. Owen (2). But the law as laid down in those cases is inapplicable to the case of subterranean water not flowing into any definite channel, nor indeed at all in the ordinary sense, but percolating or oozing through the soil more or less according to the quantity of rain that may chance to fall. The inapplicability of the general law respecting rights to water to such a case has been recognised and observed upon by many judges whose opinions are of the greatest weight and authority. A

[He referred to Rawstron v. Taylor (3), Broadbent v. Ramsbotham (1), and Acton v. Blundell (4), and continued:] There is no case of authority, of which I am aware, that can be cited in support of the position contended for by the appellant, or in which the right to subterranean percolating water adverse to that of the owner of the soil came in question, except the nisi prius case of Balston v. Bensted (5), and Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6). B

In the first of these cases LORD ELLENBOROUGH is reported to have expressed his opinion that twenty years of the enjoyment of the use of water in any manner afforded an exclusive presumption of right. This opinion amounted only to the dictum of an eminent judge followed by no decision upon the point, for the case ended in the withdrawal of a juror and is directly at variance with the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in the other case, upon which the appellant relies, of Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6), in which the court held that C

"the right to have a stream running in its natural course is not by a presumed grant from a long acquiescence on the part of the riparian proprietors above and below, but is ex jure naturæ, and an incident of property as much as the right to have the soil itself in its natural state unaltered by the acts of a neighbouring proprietor who cannot dig so as to deprive it of the support of his land. D

In Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6) the very question now before your Lordships' House arose, and that case is relied upon by the appellant as a decisive authority in his favour. The Court of Exchequer was of opinion that the company, by digging a well and pumping out the water, and so intercepting and diverting underground and percolating water which would otherwise have gone into a stream which flowed to the appellant's mill, and was applied to the working of it, had rendered themselves liable to an action for the infringement of a right at common law. In the same judgment, however, the court refers to Acton v. Blundell (4), apparently with approbation, and observes (7 Exch. at p. 300) that E

"the existence and state of underground water is generally unknown before the well is made, and after it is made there is a difficulty in knowing certainly how much, if any, of the water of the well when the ground was in its natural state belonged to the owner in right of his property in the soil, and how much belonged to his neighbour." G

He then observes that

"these practical uncertainties make it very reasonable not to apply the rules which regulate the enjoyment of streams and waters above ground to subterranean waters." H

But the court, without at all adverting to this distinction which it has adopted, treats the case of underground percolating water as governed by the same rules as would obtain in the case of visible streams and watercourses above ground, and no remark or comment is made or reason assigned by the court for arriving at a conclusion which not only does not seem warranted by the premises previously adopted, but is in effect hardly consistent with them. The plaintiff in that case was held to have a cause of action independently of any infringement of a right at common law, by reason of the breach of an agreement between the parties and of an Act of Parliament; and a decision upon the right at common law seems not to have been necessary for determining the suit between the parties. These considerations greatly weaken the effect of Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6), as an authority against the respondents upon the point now in question, but it is an authority in their favour to show that a right to water is not by a presumed grant from long acquiescence, but, if it exists at all, it is jure nature, and that the rules I

A of law that regulate the rights of parties to the use of water are not at all applicable to the case of waters percolating underground.

July 27, 1859. The following opinions were delivered.

B LORD CHELMSFORD.—The question in this case is whether the appellant is entitled to claim against the respondents the right to have the benefit of the rain-water which falls upon a district of many thousand acres in extent, and percolates through the strata to the river Wandle, increasing the supply of water in the river and being of sensible value in and towards the working of an ancient mill belonging to the appellant. The acts of the respondents by which this underground water
 C was interrupted and prevented from finding its way into the river were done upon their own land. It was conceded by the appellant in argument that a landowner had a limited and qualified right to appropriate water, the course of which is invisible and undefined, exactly to the same extent and for the same purposes as he would be entitled to use water flowing in a defined and visible channel. This, it was contended, must be confined to a reasonable use of the water for domestic and
 D agricultural purposes, and perhaps (it was said), according to the opinion of CHANCELLOR KENT, for the purposes of manufacture also. It must further be admitted (and appeared to be so in argument) that, in addition to these direct uses to which the water may be diverted, if in the regular course of mining operations the percolation of underground water is arrested in its progress and prevented reaching a point where it would have increased a supply which had previously been
 E usefully employed by an adjoining landowner, he can maintain no action for the loss of the water thus cut off from him. A distinction was suggested between such a use as the one last mentioned, where the interception of the water was merely the consequence of operations upon a party's own land, and the present, where the very end and object of the act done was to collect and appropriate the water.

On the state of things existing in this case, a further distinction was insisted upon
 F between a party sinking a well in his own land, either for domestic or agricultural or manufacturing purposes, and a public board or a water company doing the same thing for sanitary purposes, or for supplying the inhabitants of the neighbourhood with water. Before, however, the appellant can question the act of the respondents, or discuss with them the reasonableness of their claim to appropriate this underground water for their own purposes (whatever they may be), he must first
 G establish his own right to have it pass freely to his mill, subject only to the qualified and restricted use of it to which each owner may be entitled, through whose land it may make its way. It seems to me that both principle and authority are opposed to such a right. The law as to water flowing in a certain and definite channel has been conclusively settled by a series of decisions, in which the whole subject has been very fully and satisfactorily gone into and considered, and the relative rights
 H and duties of riparian proprietors have been carefully adjusted and established.

The principle of these decisions seems to me to be applicable to all water flowing in a certain and defined course, whether in an open visible stream or in a subterranean channel. I agree with the observation of POLLOCK, C.B., in Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal (6) (7 Exch. at pp. 300, 301) that

I "if the course of a subterranean stream were well known, as is the case with many which sink underground, pursue for a short space a subterranean course, and then emerge again, it never could be contended that the owner of the soil under which the stream flowed could not maintain an action for the diversion of it, if it took place under such circumstances as would have enabled him to recover if the stream had been wholly above ground."

But it appears to me that the principles which apply to flowing water in streams or rivers, the right to the flow of which in the natural state is incident to the property through which it passes, are wholly inapplicable to water percolating through underground strata, which has no certain course and no defined limit, but oozes through the soil in every direction in which the rain penetrates. There is no difficulty in determining the rights of the different proprietors to the usufruct of the water in a running stream—whether it has been increased by floods or diminished by drought it flows on in the same ascertained course, and the use which every owner may claim is only of the water which has entered into and become a part of the stream. But the right to percolating underground water is necessarily of a very uncertain description. When does this right commence? Before or after the rain had found its way to the ground? If the owner of land through which the water filters cannot intercept it in its progress, can he prevent its descending to the earth at all by catching it in tanks or cisterns? And how far will the right to this water supply extend?

In the present case the water which ultimately finds its way to the river Wandle is strained through the soil of several thousand acres. Are the most distant land-owners, as well as the adjacent ones, to be bound at their peril to take care to use their lands so as not to interrupt the oozing of the water through the soil to a greater extent than shall be necessary for their own actual wants? For, with COLERIDGE, J., I do not see “how the ignorance which the landowner has of the course of the springs below the surface, of the changes they undergo, and of the date of their commencement, is material in respect of a right which does not grow out of the assent or acquiescence of the landowner, as in the case of a servitude, but out of the nature of the thing itself.”

This distinction between water flowing in a definite channel, and water, whether above or under ground, not flowing in a stream at all, but either draining off the surface of the land or oozing through the underground soil in varying quantities and in uncertain directions depending upon the variations of the atmosphere, appears to be well settled by the cases cited in argument.

In Rawstron v. Taylor (3), it was held that in the case of common surface water rising out of spongy or boggy ground, and flowing in no definite channel, the landowner was entitled to get rid of it in any way he pleased, although it contributed to the supply of the plaintiff's mill. My noble and learned friend LORD WENSLEYDALE, then PARKE, B., in his judgment observed (11 Exch. at p. 382):

In Broadbent v. Ramsbotham (1), it was decided that a landowner has a right to appropriate surface water which flows over his land in no definite channel although the water is thereby prevented from reaching a brook, the stream of which had for more than fifty years worked the plaintiff's mill. ALDERSON, B., in delivering the judgment of the court in that case, says (11 Exch. at p. 615):

“No doubt all the water falling from heaven and shed upon the surface of the earth at the foot of which the brook runs must, by the natural force of gravity, find its way to the bottom, and so into the brook; but this does not prevent the owner of the land on which the water falls from dealing with it as he pleases and appropriating it. He cannot, it is true, do so if the water has arrived at, and is flowing in some natural channel already formed, but he has a perfect right to appropriate it before it arrives at such channel.”

These cases apply to the right to surface water not flowing in any defined natural watercourse. But, of course, the principles they establish are equally, if not more strongly, applicable to subterranean water of the same casual, undefined and varying description. This appears clearly to have been the opinion of TINDAL, C.J., and the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Acton v. Blundell (4), for, although the court abstained from intimating any opinion as to what might have been the rule of law if there had been an uninterrupted user for twenty years of the well of the plaintiff

A which had been laid dry by the mining operations of the defendant, yet the Chief Justice, having prefaced his judgment by stating (12 M. & W. at p. 348) that

“The question argued before us had been in substance this : whether the right to the enjoyment of an underground spring, or of a well supplied by such underground spring, is governed by the same rule of law as that which applied to this and regulates a watercourse flowing on the surface,”

B concludes with these words (ibid. at pp. 353, 354) :

“We think the present case . . . is not to be governed by the law which applies to rivers and flowing streams, but that it rather falls within that principle which gives to the owner of the soil all that lies beneath the surface; that the land immediately below is his property, whether it is solid rock, or porous ground, or veinous earth, or part soil, part water; that the person who owns the surface may dig therein, and apply all that is therein to be found to his own purposes, at his free will and pleasure; that if, in the exercise of such rights, he intercepts or drains off the water collected from underground springs in his neighbour's well, this inconvenience to his neighbour falls within the description of damnum absque injuria, which cannot become the ground of an action.”

The Court of Exchequer in the present case gave judgment for the respondents without argument, on the authority of the decision in Broadbent v. Ramsbotham (1). The Court of Exchequer Chamber affirmed that judgment, there having been only one dissentient opinion, which, however, pronounced (as it was) by a most learned and able judge (COLERIDGE, J.), is certainly entitled to the highest respect. The judges, of whose assistance your Lordships have had the advantage, have been unanimous in their agreement with the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber. Against this concurrence of authority, what is there to be opposed in favour of the appellant but the nisi prius case of Balston v. Bensted (5) and Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6)? With respect to Balston v. Bensted (5), it does not appear that the question of the right to water percolating through the strata, as distinguished from water flowing in a visible stream, was ever presented to LORD ELLENBOROUGH's mind, but he observed early in the trial that there could be no doubt but that twenty years' exclusive enjoyment of water in any particular manner affords a presumption of right in the party so enjoying it. Whether by the words “in any particular manner” his Lordship meant to point to the right claimed in that case, or intended to state a proposition applicable to all water of which there had been a twenty years' enjoyment, from whatever source it might be derived, it is impossible to gather from the report, but the question was never argued, and as, upon proof that the decrease of the water in the plaintiff's bath had been occasioned by the operations in the defendant's quarry, the case was at once referred, it can hardly be urged as any authority at all upon a point of such importance, which requires so much consideration, as that which it is supposed to have decided. With respect to Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6), upon which the appellant also relied, after the observations made upon it by CRESSWELL, J., in the Exchequer Chamber and by WIGHTMAN, J., delivering the opinions of the judges to this House, it is unnecessary for me to say more than that I entirely agree with them, and think that it can hardly be regarded as a satisfactory decision upon the point now under consideration.

It appears to me that reason and principle, as well as authority, are opposed to the claim of the appellant to maintain an action for the interception of the underground water which would otherwise have ultimately found its way to the river Wandle, and that, therefore, the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought to be affirmed.

LORD CRANWORTH.—I shall not trouble your Lordships by adding more than a very few words to what has fallen from my noble and learned friend, concurring, as I do, in the unanimous opinion delivered by the learned judges who assisted your Lordships at the hearing of the argument, and in the view taken by my noble and learned friend. The right to running water has always been properly described as a natural right, just like the right to the air we breathe; they are the gifts of nature, and no one has a right to appropriate them. There is no difficulty in enforcing that right, because running water is something visible, and no one can intercept it without knowing whether he does or does not do injury to those who are above or below him. But if the doctrine were applied to water merely percolating, as it is said, through the soil, and eventually reaching some stream, it would always be a matter that would require the evidence of scientific men to state whether or not there had been interruption, and whether or not there had been injury. It is a process of nature not apparent, and, therefore, such percolating water has not received the protection which water running in a natural channel on the surface has always received. If the arguments of the appellant were adopted, the consequence would be that every well that ever was sunk would have given rise, or might give rise, to an action. It is said that, in this case, this is not a well sunk by a particular individual for his own purposes, but a great well which has been sunk, and by which water is raised to a very enormous extent, for supplying the whole town of Croydon. That argument does not affect my mind at all; because, if it be conceded—as I think it must be conceded—that each and every one of the individuals residing upon this area might have sunk a well of his own to supply himself, it seems to me to be exactly the same thing whether the water is abstracted by one large well which supplies the whole community, or by a thousand small wells, by which each individual of the community supplies himself. In truth, I should think that, in all probability, the loss of water would be much greater by each individual sinking a well than by one great well being sunk for the supply of the whole community. On these grounds I entirely concur with my noble and learned friend, and I think the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought to be affirmed.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—This case is of the greatest importance, and requires the most full and attentive consideration. No question that has occurred in my time has been so worthy of the most careful examination; and though we have had a very able argument at the Bar from the learned counsel, and we also have been favoured with the unanimous opinion of six of the judges in an able judgment pronounced by WIGHTMAN, J., I must own, speaking for myself, I should still desire further discussion, as I have felt very great difficulty in coming to a conclusion satisfactory to my mind, so many difficulties presenting themselves on both sides. As, however, my noble and learned friends who heard the case argued at the Bar have not had the same difficulty in deciding that I have, I concur, though not without very serious doubts in the propriety of the conclusion at which they have arrived.

Your Lordships have for the first time to decide the question of the rights to underground water. There are two conflicting authorities—the case under appeal, and Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6). Your Lordships have to decide between them. It is supposed in the judgment in the Exchequer Chamber in this case, delivered by CRESSWELL, J., that the Court of Exchequer had in two subsequent cases, Rawstron v. Taylor (3) and Broadbent v. Ramsbotham (1), decided differently. Those cases are said to be inconsistent with the decision in Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6), and virtually to overrule it. This is certainly a mistake, for having been a party to the judgments in each of those cases, I am sure that I, at least, had no notion of impugning the doctrine which I had joined in laying down before in Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6), which was not decided without great consideration. In Broadbent v. Ramsbotham (1) it did not appear that any water which percolated the strata would have reached the brook, and I well recollect that on the argument I so considered, and, therefore, that the plaintiff could not recover on the ground on which Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6) was decided. The argument of Mr. Cowling, as reported in 25 L.J.Ex.

A 122, which is fuller than that in 11 Exch. 602, was directed to the point. I may add that the report is more correct than that in 11 Exch., which attributes to me too limited a view of the decision in Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6).

The subject of rights to streams of water flowing on the surface has been of late years fully discussed, and by a series of carefully considered judgments placed upon a clear and satisfactory ground. It has been now settled that the right to the enjoyment of a natural stream of water on the surface ex jure naturæ belongs to the proprietor of the adjoining lands as a natural incident to the right to the soil itself, and that he is entitled to the benefit of it as he is to all the other natural advantages belonging to the land of which he is the owner. He has the right to have it come to him in its natural state, in flow, quantity, and quality, and to go from him without obstruction, upon the same principle as that on which he is entitled to the support of his neighbour's soil for his own in its natural state. His right in no way depends upon prescription or the presumed grant of his neighbours.

The elaborate judgment of LORD DENMAN, in Mason v. Hill (7) in 1833, reviewed most prior judgments and authorities of importance up to that date, and fully established that proposition. But former authorities, and of a very early date, when carefully considered, really left no room for doubt on the subject. In Shury v. Piggot (8) decided in 1626, WHITLOCK, J., laid it down that a watercourse differs from a way or common; that it doth not begin by prescription, nor yet by assent, but the same doth begin ex jure naturæ, having taken this course naturally, and cannot be arrested; and he observed that the course of a spring is a natural course and current, and to stop this may be a nuisance to the commonwealth and a private wrong. In Brown v. Best (9), LEE, C.J., is reported to have said that a watercourse is jure naturæ and, therefore, a declaration stating merely the possession of the place through which the water used to run is good. DENISON, J., said that in natural watercourses that was the most proper mode of declaring. The decision in Mason v. Hill (7) has been followed by many others, laying down the same propositions: Wood v. Waud (10) (3 Exch. at pp. 774, 775). Mason v. Hill (7), had been preceded by Wright v. Howard (11), before SIR JOHN LEACH, V.-C.; and it was followed by Embrey v. Owen (2), and by Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (6).

This position is also established in the American courts: Tyler v. Wilkinson (12); and sanctioned by the best writers of the highest authority: 3 KENT'S COMMENTARIES, Lect. 52, pp. 439, 455. It is laid down as the first proposition in the very able treatise on WATERCOURSES by MR. ANGELL, an American authority, pp. 1 and 21, 22, and it has been held in America that the law implied damage from the violation of the right (vide ANGELL ON WATERCOURSES, 98; Pastorius v. Fisher (13))—a matter which has been sometimes doubted, though probably without sufficient room.

We may consider, therefore, that this proposition is indisputable—that the right of the proprietor to the enjoyment of a watercourse on the surface is a natural right, and not acquired by occupation of the stream itself, or presumed grant. The expressions used by BAYLEY, J., in Williams v. Morland (14), and by TINDAL, C.J., in Liggins v. Inge (15), that water flowing in a stream is publici juris, and the property of the first occupier, are founded on a mistake between the property in the water itself, and the right to have its continual flow. The observation also of TINDAL, C.J., in Acton v. Blundell (4), and of MAULE, J., in Smith v. Kendrick (16), as to the origin of the right to the continued flow of a superficial stream, being the presumed acquiescence of the proprietors above and below, which is the foundation of the distinction made by the Lord Chief Justice between those streams and subterranean watercourses, cannot be supported. The right to a natural stream flowing in a definite channel is not confined to streams on the surface, but the right to an underground stream flowing in a known and definite channel is equally a right ex natura, and an incident to the land itself, as a beneficial adjunct to it, as was determined in Wood v. Waud (10).

If the river Wandle in this case had been supplied by natural streams flowing into the river above ground or in known definite channels below ground, the cutting off those streams to which the person entitled to the use of the river was entitled ex natura as feeders of the river would be an injury to him and give him a right of action. And if this be true with regard to underground streams finding their way into the river, then comes the difficulty how to distinguish the smaller rivulets and particles of water which flow and percolate into and supply the river. They are all equally the gift of nature for the benefit of the proprietors of the soil, through and into which they flow. They are all flowing water the property in which is not vested in the owner of the soil any more than the property in the water of a river which flows through it on the surface. In Acton v. Blundell (4) it is said by TINDAL, C.J., that the case

“rather falls within that principle which gives to the owner of the soil all that lies beneath his surface; that the land immediately below is his property, whether it be solid rock or porous ground, or veinous earth, or part soil, part water; that the person who owns the surface may dig therein and apply all that he finds to his own purposes at his free will and pleasure.”

If this applies to water underground naturally in a course of transit—and it must do so to be applicable—and not to mere stagnant water, I agree with COLERIDGE, J., in his remark that the reason why it is more the subject of property than the water flowing above ground is not explained. Surely the use of the flowing water in each case, and not the property in it, belongs to the proprietor of the surface. As to that part of COLERIDGE, J.'s opinion in which he relies on the possession of the mill for thirty or sixty years, I think he is wrong. I do not think that the principle on which prescription rests can be applied. It has not been with the permission of the proprietor of the land that the streams have flowed into the river for twenty years or upwards: qui non prohibet quod prohibere potest, assentire videtur. But how here could he prevent it? He could not bring an action against the adjoining proprietor; he could not be bound to dig a deep trench in his own land to cut off the supplies of water, in order to indicate his dissent. It is going very far to say that a man must be at the expense of putting up a screen to window lights to prevent a title being gained by twenty years' enjoyment of light passing through a window. But this case would go very far beyond that. I think that the enjoyment of the right to these natural streams cannot be supported by any length of enjoyment, if it does not belong of natural right to the plaintiff. For the same reason I dispute the correctness of LORD ELLENBOROUGH's opinion in the case of the spring in Balston v. Bensted (5), where there had been twenty years' enjoyment of it in a particular mode.

The true foundation of the right is that it is incident to the land ex jure naturæ. What, then, is the distinction between superficial streams and subterranean water? With respect to underground water percolating the strata, two considerations arise which make a material difference between it and the right to superficial streams. In the first place, these subterranean waters cannot be actually enjoyed (and all things are given to be enjoyed) without artificial means. The water must be reduced into possession before it can be used, and some mode of reducing into possession must be permitted by law. If there be no such right, underground water is comparatively useless. A man may, therefore, dig for his own supply or make a well for his own use, and that of his family, and in so doing he may deprive his neighbour's land of moisture, and even tap a copious spring and prevent it from flowing to his neighbour's close. It can rarely happen that, in excavating in order to obtain the use of the water, some injury will not be caused to the subterranean supplies of a neighbour, especially as the precise course and direction of such water can seldom be known accurately beforehand. In the second place, as the great interests of society require that the cultivation of every man's land should be encouraged and its natural advantages made fully available, the owner must be permitted to dig in his own soil, and in so doing he can very rarely avoid interfering with the subterranean water flowing or percolating in his neighbour's land. In the civil law are to be found many instances in which it is allowed to cut off subterranean

A supplies, if it is done in the cultivation of the soil. In the DIGEST, lib. 39, tit. 3, art. 1, s. iii (POTHIER's edition, vol. 3, p. 578), it is said

“Denique Marcellus scribit; cum eo, qui in suo fodiens vicini fontem avertit, nihil posse agi, nec de dolo actionem non debet habere, si non animo vicini nocendi, sed suum agrum meliorem faciendi, id fecit.”

B A very extensive sense is given to these words, authorising the improvement of the proprietor's own land, in the civil law. In the DIGEST, lib. 39, tit. 3, art. 1, s. ix, “DE AQUA,” it is said that the making a work “agri colendi causa et frugum querendarum causa” and thereby altering the course of the aquae pluviae, is not actionable. The term “fruges” is said to be the same as rent: s. ix, see POTHIER's DIGEST, 379.

C It would seem, therefore, that, if the sources of a fountain or spring in an adjoining piece of land were cut off by excavating in order to get the minerals in any place, it would be deemed by the Roman law to fall within the principle of the improvement of the land, and not be actionable. Acton v. Blundell (4) would be rightly decided upon this ground, because the injury to the plaintiff's well was caused by the lawful exercise of the defendant's right to get the minerals in his

D land, and, unless he had that right, the public would have lost the benefit of a valuable gift of Providence. We came to the conclusion that every man has a right to the natural advantages of his soil—the plaintiff to the benefit of the flow of water in the river and its natural supplies; the defendant to the enjoyment of his land, and to the underground waters in it; and he may, in order to obtain that water, sink a well. But, according to the rule of reason and law—sic utere tuo ut

E non alienum laedas—it seems right to hold that he ought to exercise his right in a reasonable manner, with as little injury to his neighbour's rights as may be. The civil law deems an act, otherwise lawful in itself, illegal, if done with a malicious intent of injuring a neighbour: animo vicini nocendi. The same principle is adopted in the laws of Scotland, where an otherwise lawful act is forbidden if done aemulatione vicini: BELL'S PRINCIPLES, s. 966.

F The question in this case, therefore, as it seems to me, resolves itself into an inquiry whether the respondents exercised their right of enjoying the subterranean waters in a reasonable manner. Had they made the well and used their steam-engines for the supply of water for the use of their own property and those living on it, there could have been no question, if the number of houses upon it had increased to any extent, and the quantity of water for the families dwelling on the

G property had been proportionately augmented, that there could have been no just ground of complaint, but I doubt very greatly the legality of the respondents' acts in abstracting water for the use of a large district in the neighbourhood unconnected with their estate, who would have no right to take it directly themselves, to the injury of those neighbouring proprietors who have an equal right with themselves. It does not follow that each person who was supplied with water by the respondents

H could have dug a well himself on his own land and taken the like quantity of water; the respondents may have taken much more than would have been abstracted if each had exercised his own right. The same objection would not apply to the abstraction of water for the use of the dwellers on the respondents' land, even though they carried on trades requiring more water (brewers for example) than would be used for mere domestic purposes. It would still be for their purposes

I only, but in this case there has been an abstraction of water for purposes wholly unconnected with the enjoyment of the respondents' land. On the whole, I should certainly have wished to give this important case further consideration; but as my noble and learned friends have formed their opinions upon it, I acquiesce, and do not give my advice to your Lordships to reverse the judgment.

LORD KINGSDOWN.—I confess that I am unable to share in the doubts that have been expressed by LORD WENSLEYDALE in the able and elaborate opinion which he has just delivered. I entirely concur in the opinion which has been given by the judges unanimously in this case, and for the reasons by which that judgment has been supported. A

LORD CHELMSFORD.—I ought to have mentioned that my noble and learned friend LORD BROUGHAM, who is compelled to leave the House today, but who was present during the whole of the argument, entirely concurs in the opinion which I have expressed. B

Appeal dismissed.

Case referred to in argument: H

Loscombe v. Wintringham (1850), 13 Beav. 87; 51 E.R. 34; 8 Digest (Repl.) 417, 1084.

Motion for a decree.

By his will made in 1839, the testator, James Baylis, gave the rent of a leasehold house at Blackheath, and certain dividends, to the plaintiff for life, with remainder, as to one moiety, to her children, and as to the dividends of the other moiety the testator stated: I

"I give to the treasurer for the time being of the Female Orphan Asylum at Greenwich aforesaid, patronised by Mrs. Enderby, the sum of £50 for the benefit of that charity."

The testator died in 1846, at which time the institution in question was also defunct. The plaintiff claimed that the legacy of £50 had lapsed, and that she

A was entitled to it, being residuary legatee under the will. The defendant had for six years refused to pay it to her, and alleged that, by the doctrine of cy-près, the Court of Chancery might direct him to pay it to some other charitable institution for the benefit of female orphans.

Bazalgette for the plaintiff.

J. H. Palmer for one of the defendants.

B Busk for the executors.

Wickens for the Attorney-General.

KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—What appears from the evidence in this case is this: Mrs. Enderby had once kept a school for female orphans, and received assistance by sermons and otherwise; and the bill in all probability contemplated an endowed charity when it stated that there was no such charity as that mentioned in the testator's will. There are cases in which this court has said, "This is a gift to a charity generally, indicating a general charitable purpose, and pointing out the mode in which the testator designed it should be applied." If the testator's particular design cannot be effected, still, in such a case as this, the court will carry out his general charitable intention. Then, again, there are cases in which it is clear the testator does not contemplate general charity, but only some particular benefit to one institution. In such a case as this, if that one institution does not exist to receive the benefit at his death, the legacy does not go to charity generally. The doctrine of cy-près does not apply, nor does the Crown attempt to dispose of it.

There are cases which it is very difficult to place under either of these two classes; though there can be very little doubt that this case belongs to the second. E A charity or school clearly did exist; and it is just possible that, from friendship to Mrs. Enderby, the testator meant specifically to benefit that establishment patronised by her, and that alone; for, it may be observed, he does not say, "I give this sum to the school of Mrs. Enderby because I mean to support female orphan institutions generally"; but he gave this sum of £50 to the clearly showing an intention to benefit only that charity. Without, therefore, trenching upon the doctrine laid down in the cases cited, or on that of the cy-près, this case is, in my opinion, one where it cannot be said the testator had any other than a particular intention to benefit one charity; and as that was defunct at the time of his decease, the legacy of £50 must be held to have lapsed; and there must be a declaration to that effect; and that the plaintiff is entitled to it as residuary legatee.

Order accordingly.

Trade-Name—Right to sell goods under own name—Name same as that of other trader.

The defendant manufactured and sold under his own name a fish sauce described as "Essence of Anchovies." The plaintiff, his father, had for many years sold a similar sauce under the same name and description, which had become very well known. The plaintiff sought an injunction to restrain the defendant from selling his sauce under that name.

Held: the celebrity of the plaintiff's product did not give him any right to prevent a person of the same name selling everything he manufactured under that name, and, in the absence of fraud or passing-off by the defendant, the plaintiff could not prevent him from selling his goods under his own name.

B Appeal from a decision of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in an action by the plaintiff, William Robert Burgess against the defendant, his son, William Harding Burgess, to restrain the defendant by injunction from having or continuing on his shop-front the words "late of 107, Strand," and from having or continuing on the sides of the door of his shop any plate containing the words "Burgess's Fish Sauce Warehouse, late of 107, Strand"; and also from selling or disposing of, or causing to be sold or disposed of, any sauce, essence, or composition, manufactured by or for him (the defendant) and described as, or purporting to be, or represented as being, "Burgess's Essence of Anchovies"; and from printing or using those words as descriptive of the article manufactured by himself, either upon labels or wrappers, and with the bottles in which the article was sold by the defendant, or in the advertisements, circulars, or catalogues published by the defendant.

D The evidence was that the father of the plaintiff, one John Burgess, had for forty years carried on business on his own account as an Italian warehouseman at a shop or warehouse at No. 17, Strand. The plaintiff in 1800 was taken into partnership with his father, and they continued to carry on the business together, under the style or firm of "John Burgess & Son,," until 1820, when the father died, and the plaintiff, who had succeeded to his father's business, continued it down to the present time on the same premises under the same style of "John Burgess & Son."

E Among other articles in which the original firm, and afterwards the plaintiff, had been in the habit of dealing, was a fish sauce sold under the name of "Burgess's Essence of Anchovies." The defendant, who had formerly been employed by his father, after a disagreement left him, and commenced trading on his own account as an Italian warehouseman, at No. 36, King William Street, in the city of London.

F The plaintiff alleged that the defendant, for the purpose of leading the public to believe that he was the same Burgess as the plaintiff, and that the business carried on by the defendant was the same business as that carried on by the plaintiff in the Strand, or an offset or continuation of such business, had caused to be placed over his shop-front, in King William Street, the words "W. H. Burgess, late of 107, Strand," and on each side of the door of such shop or warehouse, had caused to be fixed a metal plate with the words "Burgess's Fish Sauce Warehouse, late of 107, Strand"; and that the defendant was selling a fish sauce purporting to be "Burgess's Essence of Anchovies," but at a lower price than that of the article sold by the plaintiff under the same description or title, and that such sauce was offered for sale by the defendant in bottles similar in size and shape to the bottles used by the plaintiff, accompanied by labels, wrappers, and catalogues bearing a general resemblance to those used by the plaintiff in the sale of his essence of anchovies; and in particular, that upon such labels, wrappers, and catalogues, the essence of anchovies sold by the defendant was described as "Burgess's Essence of Anchovies," a title under which the article sold by the plaintiff was well known, and had long enjoyed a great celebrity in the market. The plaintiff alleged that the labels, wrappers, and catalogues so used by the defendant, and particularly the words "Burgess's Essence of Anchovies" printed thereon, had been adopted and used by the defendant with the fraudulent object of deceiving the public, and leading persons purchasing the sauce manufactured and sold by the defendant to believe that they were purchasing the essence of anchovies manufactured and sold by the plaintiff, and which was commonly known as "Burgess's Essence of Anchovies."

I When the motion came before KINDERSLEY, V.-C., on Oct. 5, 1852; he granted an injunction to restrain the defendant from continuing over his shop-front the words "late of 107, Strand," and from continuing on the sides of his shop-door the plate with the words "Burgess's Fish Sauce Warehouse, late of 107, Strand"; but refused A the rest of the motion. The plaintiff considering himself entitled to the whole of the relief sought by his bill, appealed from that order.

Sir Frederick Thesiger, Campbell and W. R. Moore for the plaintiff.

Bacon and May for the defendant were not called on to argue.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J. All the Queen's subjects have a right to sell pickles and B other articles; and not the less so if their fathers have done so before them. All the Queen's subjects have a right to call themselves by their own names; and not the less so if they happen to have been their fathers' names. Nothing else has the present defendant done in that which is in question before us in the present case. He follows the trade that his father follows and has followed, namely, a C manufacturer and seller of pickles, preserves, and sauces, and among them a sauce called "Essence of Anchovies." He carries on his business under his own name, and sells his essence as "Burgess's Essence of Anchovies," which truly it is. If any circumstances of fraud of a material character had appeared, the case would stand very differently; but it has been very correctly stated that the whole case is founded upon the great celebrity which during many years has been possessed by the elder Mr. Burgess's essence of anchovies. It does not appear to me that D there is such an exclusive privilege as to prevent a person of the name of Burgess selling everything that he manufactures under his own name.

Without questioning any of the authorities, all of which I assume to be correctly cited, there is no case for an injunction here. Even if I had a doubt upon the subject, it would be impossible to accede to the present motion simply upon an interlocutory motion by way of appeal, notice having been given in March from an E order made in the preceding October complaining of that order. I am of opinion that this motion ought to be refused with costs, with liberty to take such proceedings in a court of law as the plaintiff may be advised.

TURNER, L.J.—I am of opinion that this motion must be refused. I take it to be clear that no man has a right to represent his own goods to be the goods of F another. The case must be made that the defendant is selling his own goods as the goods of another. When a person is selling goods in a name which is his own, and another, not having that name, uses that name, he is representing that which is not the case. But here two persons have the same name. It does not at all follow that because one man, the defendant, sells goods in his own name, and the plaintiff happens to have the same name, that, therefore, the defendant is selling his goods G as the goods of others. Here the question is whether there is a representation that the goods so sold are the goods of the other. Looking at the evidence in this case, it seems to me to be clear that since the order of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., there has been no representation on the part of the defendant that the goods he is selling are the goods manufactured by the plaintiff. It is, therefore, clear that the motion must be refused with costs, with liberty for the plaintiff to apply to a court of law, H as he may be advised.

Appeal dismissed.

Application by the plaintiff for the costs of the action under s. 4 of the County Courts Act, 1852 [repealed]. The action was brought in this court to recover from the defendant £10 16s. 8d. due to the plaintiff for work done in a mine in the Launceston County Court District of which the defendant was a shareholder. The cause was tried under a writ of trial before the under-sheriff of Cornwall, when a verdict was returned for the plaintiff. The plaintiff's affidavit showed that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the Launceston County Court, and that the defendant resided and carried on his business as a surgeon and apothecary at Callington, within the jurisdiction of the Liskeard County Court. It appeared from the defendant's affidavit that, although he resided at Callington, he carried on his business of a surgeon and accoucheur at Launceston, by attending daily patients within several parishes within the jurisdiction of the Launceston County Court and that he was the surgeon of the Launceston union.

Maynard for the plaintiff.

H

Collier for the defendant.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be refused on the ground that the defendant carries on his business within the jurisdiction of the Launceston County Court. In looking at the language of the affidavits, care should be taken that they are framed with such strictness that it should appear that there has been no evasion of the County Courts Act, 1846, and that it has been substantially complied with. The defendant says that, at the time the action was brought, he was carrying on the business of a surgeon and accoucheur at Launceston, and was attending, and now attends, at Launceston, several patients, being resident within the several parishes named within the jurisdiction. That is an averment that he is in the daily habit of attending patients being resident within that place, and we should be trifling with language if any other construction were put on it. As to the construction of s. 128 of the County Courts Act, 1846, that section says that actions may be brought in the superior court

"where the cause of action did not arise wholly or in some material point within the jurisdiction of the court within which the defendant dwells or carries on his business at the time of the action brought." A

The limit given for dwelling is, "within the jurisdiction of the court"; and it is the same as his carrying on his business—if it is within the jurisdiction, that is sufficient. There must undoubtedly be something personal, and not merely by an agent; the dwelling must be personal, and so must the carrying on of the business. B Suppose, however, the nature of the business to be moving about within a particular district; that is carrying on business within that district. What does the defendant say here? He says that he is in daily attendance on his patients within the Launceston district, which is sufficient to show that he was carrying on his business there.

That being so, let us see the cases that have already been decided. The first is that of Rolfe v. Learmonth (1), which was the case of an officer of the Lord Chancellor, namely, the Deputy Sealer of the Writs, whose duty it was to attend on the Lord Chancellor wherever he might be; and it was there held that his was not a business carried on at any fixed place—it was an office which had no reference whatever to locality. The next case is that of Buckley v. Hann (2), which was decided on the authority of Rolfe v. Learmonth (1), and in which it was held that a clerk in the Admiralty, who as such attends daily at an office within the city of London, is not a person who carries on his business there within the London Small Debts Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict., c. lxxi). In Stephens v. Derry (3), which was under the London Court of Requests Act, 1800, the actual residence of the defendant was in Middlesex, where his wife carried on business, though he himself was employed as a clerk in the office of a solicitor in London; and all the judges were of opinion that he was seeking his livelihood where he was residing, and where his wife was carrying on the business. In Gray v. Cook (4), which was under the same Act, a market gardener rented at an annual rent a stand with a shed over it in Fleet Market which he occupied three times a week, on market-days, till ten o'clock in the morning; after which, and on all other days, it was occupied by others. It was held that he did not keep a stand within the meaning of the Act; but that case has little bearing on the present one. E F

On the whole, I think that this rule ought to be refused.

Rule refused.

Medical Practitioner—Unregistered person—Description of "surgeon and mechanical dentist"—Falsely pretending to be registered person—Question of fact for justices.

The respondent kept a chemist's and druggist's shop on the door of which were the words "surgeon and mechanical dentist." He examined a woman's arm and gave her a liniment for which she paid. The justices dismissed an information against the respondent for falsely pretending to be a surgeon, contrary to s. 40 of the Medical Act, 1858.

Held: it being a question of fact for the justices, their finding must be upheld.

Case Stated by Kingston-upon-Thames magistrates.

The London Medical Registration Society preferred an information against the respondent Frederick Gould, under s. 40 of the Medical Act, 1858, charging that, at his residence in Eden Street, Kingston, he took and used the title of surgeon without legal qualification, he not being registered under the Medical Act, 1858; and that in that capacity he treated one Charlotte Tenniswood for a surgical complaint, and supplied her with medicine for the same, contrary to the form of the statute, for which medicine he was paid, and for which offence he had forfeited a sum not exceeding £20.

G

The prosecution was conducted by the appellant, the secretary of the London Medical Registration Society. It was proved that, on Aug. 5, 1859, Charlotte Tenniswood went to the respondent's shop, and told him that she had knocked her elbow and that it caused a great numbness in her arm and fingers. The respondent examined her arm, said that she had undoubtedly jarred the marrow of the bone, and gave her a liniment, for which she paid him 1s. She said that she noticed that he had "surgeon" on the side of his door, and she believed him to be a surgeon, or she would not have gone to him, but she afterwards said that the word "surgeon" was followed by the words "and mechanical dentist." It was also proved that the respondent's name, with the words "chemist and druggist," was on his shop front, and that the woman went to his shop, which was also a chemist's and druggist's, because, she said, she thought that he would supply her with something cheaper than by going to a doctor's. She also stated that she had made no complaint to the registration society, but that, on the day after she had got the liniment, she consulted a surgeon and he gave her a lotion and told her not to use the liniment. The surgeon afterwards called on her with a gentleman, asked her name, and said that they should want her as a witness.

I

The magistrates were of opinion that the respondent had used the word "surgeon" simply to show what branches of the business of a dentist he carried on, and not to represent himself as a surgeon within the meaning of the Act; and, at all events, there was not sufficient evidence that he wilfully (as well as falsely) pretended to, or took, or used the name of a surgeon or other title implying that he was recognised by law as a surgeon. They dismissed the information, and the appellant now appealed. A

Lush, Q.C., for the appellant, said that the magistrates meant to leave to the court the question whether the evidence brought the respondent within the meaning of s. 40 of the Act of 1858. B

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J.—I do not think that it does, but this is a question of fact. It is like the case of persons who call themselves "surgeon-dentists," who are known generally not to be surgeons, though some of them are. B

CROMPTON, J.—It is like the case of the "surgeon-chiroprpodists." But it is a matter of fact for the magistrates. The Act of 1858 gives power to put questions of law only to this court, not questions of fact. C

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J.—I do not think that there was any falsehood, or any intention to deceive, which was necessary in order to bring the case within the Medical Act, 1858, s. 40. That was also the opinion of the magistrates, though they might have come to a different opinion. D

CROMPTON, J.—I think that there was evidence upon which the magistrates might have come to either conclusion, but I cannot say that they were bound to convict. D

Appeal dismissed.

Sale of Goods—Warranty—Untrue statement believed to be true—Horse sold by auction without guarantee—Prior representation by seller that horse sound—Horse not sound—Liability. F

The defendant sent a horse to Tattersall's for sale by auction. The day before the sale, seeing the plaintiff examining the horse's legs, the defendant said that he did not need to do that, the horse was all right, he was perfectly sound. The plaintiff replied that, if the defendant said so, he was satisfied. The plaintiff bought the horse at the auction without a warranty. Subsequently, the horse was found to be unsound. No fraud was imputed to the defendant, who did not know that the horse was unsound. G

Held: the defendant had merely represented what he believed to be the fact, and, therefore, there was no evidence of a warranty. H

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to set aside the verdict for the plaintiff and enter a nonsuit in an action for breach of warranty on the sale of a horse.

D In 1853, the defendant sent his horse "California" to Tattersall's for sale. The plaintiff and the defendant were known to each other, and the defendant, on the Sunday before the sale, which always took place on a Monday, saw the plaintiff kneeling down and feeling the horse's legs. He said to him, "You need not do that—he is all right, he is perfectly sound," or words to that effect. The plaintiff at the sale bought the horse for £150, the horse being sold by Tattersall's without a warranty. The horse was subsequently sent by the plaintiff to a trainer, who, perceiving a swelling on one of his legs, stated that he was unsound and not fit for training. This being mentioned to the defendant, it was referred to some friends of the parties to say whether the horse was sold with a warranty, and whether he was sound at the time. Before them, the defendant admitted that what he had said to the plaintiff amounted to a warranty.

E At the trial before TALFOURD, J., a verdict was found for the plaintiff, damages £150. It was proved that the defendant did not know that the horse was unsound, and no fraud was imputed to him.

The defendant obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a nonsuit entered, on the ground that there was no warranty.

G Serjeant Byles and Finlason showed cause against the rule. Lush was not called on to support the rule.

JERVIS, C.J.—This rule must be made absolute. The arguments raised are on points well established, but not determining this case. It is not necessary to define a warranty, or to have the word "promise" mentioned in a bargain. A statement may amount to a warranty, as has been well decided; and it is not necessary H that it should be made simultaneously with the bargain. Counsel for the defendant says that you may, by an agreement before a sale by public auction, alter the nature of the contract as to the article itself, and he cites Bartlett v. Purnell (1). But that case does not establish his proposition. The bargain there did not alter the character of the article sold, it being only an agreement that payment should be made in a certain way. The words used by the defendant are clearly a representation, and a representation only. I The plaintiff is examining the horse. The defendant says that he is all right, and perfectly sound. The plaintiff says, "I am satisfied"; and, being satisfied with the honourable representation of the party, he does no more. He does not have him examined by a veterinary surgeon. Then Tattersall's sells the horse without any warranty at all. I think, therefore, that the defendant represented what he believed to be the fact; that the plaintiff took it as such, and that there was no warranty. I think that what took place at the arbitration, and what was said by the defendant, makes no difference. It only shows that he did not know what a legal warranty was.

MAULE, J.—I am of the same opinion. There was no warranty at the sale, and the horse was dealt with by the auctioneer as not warranted. It is said that you can import what took place before on the Sunday, and that it amounted to a warranty. But I think that there is not the smallest ground for inferring that that was a warranty. That other unprofessional persons should think so makes no difference. It amounts only to this, that the defendant was believed by the plaintiff to be a person of veracity and skill about horses; and, the plaintiff being about to examine the horse, the defendant says, "You need not do this—I have examined him and found him sound." That is said without any fraud, and is merely a representation by the defendant that the horse is, in his opinion, perfectly sound, and was not intended to subject him to the liability of paying for the loss, if the horse should, without his having known it, turn out unsound. That is much strengthened by the fact that both parties knew that the horse was to be sold unwarranted. There was, therefore, no evidence to go to the jury of a warranty.

Sale of Land—Failure by purchaser to complete—Forfeiture of deposit—Re-sale of property—Right of vendor to recover deposit in addition to expenses of re-sale.

The plaintiff put up for sale by auction a cottage and garden on conditions of sale one of which provided that, if the purchaser failed to comply with the conditions, the deposit money "shall be actually forfeited to the vendor, who shall be at full liberty to re-sell," that any deficiency that might arise on a re-sale, together with all expenses attending the same, should be made good by the defaulter, and that on non-payment thereof the amount should be recoverable by the vendor as and for liquidated damages. The defendant purchased the property at the auction for £120, but he did not pay the deposit nor complete the purchase, and the plaintiff re-sold the property for £105.

Held: the plaintiff having obtained a right to the deposit (which had been forfeited) he was now entitled to recover the difference between the £120 less the deposit and the £105.

A Rule Nisi to reduce damages in an action for breach of contract.

The plaintiff put up for sale by auction a cottage and garden, and it was knocked down to the defendant for £120 under the usual conditions. The defendant signed an agreement, but did not pay the deposit, and ultimately refused to complete his purchase. The plaintiff re-sold the premises by auction for £105, and sued the defendant for the deposit £24, the deficiency £15, and the costs of re-sale, etc., £9 5s. At the trial before ERLE, J., a verdict was directed for the amount of those sums. A rule nisi was obtained by the defendant to reduce the amount to £24 5s., the deficiency in price and expenses.

The seventh condition of sale provided :

"That if the purchaser . . . shall fail to comply with these conditions, the deposit money shall be actually forfeited to the vendor, who shall be at full liberty to re-sell the lot by public auction or private contract; and any deficiency that may arise upon such re-sale, together with all expenses attending the same, shall immediately after such second sale be made good by such defaulter; and, on non-payment thereof, such amount shall be recoverable by the vendor as and for liquidated damages, without the necessity of previously tendering an assignment or other assurance to the defaulter; but any increase of price that may be produced at such second sale shall belong to the vendor."

Hannen showed cause against the rule.

J. O. Griffiths supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 31, 1858. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., read the following judgment of the court.—There being a direct forfeiture of the deposit by the express words of the seventh condition, if the deposit had been paid, it could not in any event have been recovered back by the purchaser, and the seller would have been entitled to any addition or benefit from the re-sale. The seller having obtained a right to the forfeited deposit, and making a further demand of damages sustained on the re-sale, it becomes necessary to consider what was the nature of the deposit. It is well settled by our law, following the rule of the civil law, that a pecuniary deposit on a purchase is to be considered as a payment in part of the purchase-money, and not as a mere pledge for the performance of the contract; and the authorities are collected in SUGDEN'S VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (13th edn.), ch. 1, s. III, art. 18. Therefore, in this case, if the deposit had been paid, the balance only of the purchase-money would have remained payable. What then, according to the seventh condition, is the deficiency arising on the re-sale which the seller is entitled to recover? We think that it is the difference between the balance of the purchase-money on the first sale and the amount of the purchase-money obtained on the second sale; or, in other words, the deposit, although forfeited so far as to prevent the purchaser from ever recovering it back, according to Palmer v. Temple (1), still is to be brought by the seller into account if he seeks to recover as for a deficiency on the re-sale. The rule, therefore, to reduce the damages to £24 5s. will be made absolute.

I may mention that we have consulted LORD ST. LEONARDS on this point, having such profound respect for his knowledge on every branch of the law, particularly on this, and he most obligingly gave us his opinion, which is in exact conformity to the judgment which I have read.

Rule absolute.

Will—Soldier's will—"Actual military service"—Need for testator to be on an expedition—Staff officer stationed in England—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict., c. 26), s. 11.

By s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837: "Any soldier being in actual military service . . . may dispose of his personal estate as he might have done before the making of this Act."

The effect of the words "in actual military service" is to confine the privilege conferred by the section to soldiers, of all ranks, who are on an expedition. Accordingly, where a major-general, who held the office of director-general of the Royal Artillery and was stationed at Woolwich, wrote out a testamentary paper which he signed and sealed, but which was not attested by witnesses as required by s. 9 of the Wills Act, 1837,

Held: the testator was not "in actual military service" within s. 11 when he executed the document, and, therefore, it was not a valid will.

Statute—Construction—Foreign law—Reference to foreign code whence principle of statute borrowed.

In construing a statute very little assistance can be derived from ancient or modern codes of other countries, but cases occur where in interpreting an Act the assistance of foreign codes from which the principle of the particular statute has been borrowed has been resorted to in order to give the true interpretation of the Act.

Allegation propounding a holograph will of Major-General Drummond, who died at Woolwich on Jan. 1, 1843.

A testamentary paper was found locked up in a private repository of the deceased. It was dated June 26, 1842, it was signed by the deceased, and it had a seal opposite to the signature but, it was not attested by witnesses. This paper was propounded as the last will and testament of the deceased on the ground that it was a valid will in view of the provisions of s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, which enacted :

"Any soldier, being in actual military service, or any mariner or seaman being at sea, may dispose of his personal estate as he might have done before the making of this Act."

- D Article 5 of the allegation propounding set forth that the deceased, at the date of his will and at the time of his death, was a major-general in Her Majesty's army, on full-pay; he held the appointment of Director-General of the Royal Artillery; and he received the full-pay and allowances of that appointment. The duties of his office extended to the troops of the Royal Artillery, abroad, as well as in
- E England. He was liable to be tried by court-martial. He was subject in all respects to military law, and, accordingly, was liable to be sent abroad upon foreign service whenever it might be required. He was as completely, to all intents and purposes, in the actual service of Her Majesty as if he had been in the command of, or serving with, a British regiment on foreign service. The admission of this allegation was opposed by

- F The Queen's Advocate (Sir J. Dodson) and Twiss for the next-of-kin of the deceased.

Haggard and Pratt supported the allegation on behalf of beneficiaries under the will.

Cur. adv. vult.

- G May 19, 1843. SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST delivered the following judgment.—This question relates to a paper which is propounded as the last will and testament of Major-General Drummond, who died in January in the present year. The paper is all in the handwriting of the deceased. It is dated June 26, 1842, and is signed by him, and sealed, but it is not attested by witnesses, so that, under the general provisions of the Wills Act, 1837, it is not entitled to probate—I say
- H the general provisions of the Act, because the paper is propounded as a good and valid disposition of property, as coming under the exception in s. 11 of the Act. It was contended, when the admissibility of this allegation was debated, that this privilege extended to soldiers of all degrees and under any circumstances, with this exception, that there might be a distinction between soldiers on full-pay and those on half-pay, but that otherwise all persons belonging to the British army are
- I to be considered as being on "actual military service." Assuming this to be the construction of the Act of Parliament, the effect would be to give to every soldier on full pay, from the recruit of today to the oldest general in the service, a disposition over personal property, not only by a writing unattested by witnesses, but by a will made by word of mouth. The exceptive clause in the Wills Act is the same as that in the Statute of Frauds, by which last statute it became, for the first time, necessary that all wills of personal property should be in writing. Therefore, as I have said, it would give to all soldiers on full-pay, taking that to be the interpretation of the words, "actual military service," the power of disposing of property in any manner, as they might have done previously to the Act passing, and, consequently, as before the Statute of Frauds a will, made by word of mouth, would have been as operative as a will executed in the most formal manner, the effect of this clause would be to give at the present day validity to the most informal will. A

This is, indeed, a most startling proposition. It seems hardly possible that it should be the intention of the legislature to except out of the Wills Act so large a body of persons as the British Army now consists of or indeed as in the time of Charles II it was composed of. It is to be remembered that the exception was first made when the Statute of Frauds was passed (in 1676); it must, therefore, be considered with reference to the circumstances of that time, for s. 11 of the present Act is only a continuation of the privilege granted to soldiers and mariners in the time of Charles II. Prior to the Statute of Frauds a will might not only be made by word of mouth, but the most solemn will might be revoked by word of mouth; a will executed in the presence of witnesses might be revoked by parol. What would be the effect, what would be the state in which the whole of the British army would be placed, if this clause were now to have universal operation among that large body? In the present case the will is one which undoubtedly the court would be most anxious to support, if it can; it is a holograph, and, therefore, is not liable to the suspicion of being a forgery as might be the case in respect to a will in which the signature only was in the handwriting of the deceased; it is a will written with great care; it was kept by the testator in his private repository; there is no question that it is the act of the deceased; the only question is: Is it a will which can be carried into effect? It also unfortunately happens, that if this holograph paper can be supported, the court must include in such a determination papers less formal than this, wills by parol, for it is only by showing that the exception extends to all classes of the army, and to all descriptions of testamentary disposition, that this paper can be supported. I much doubt whether if this privilege could be maintained it would be for the benefit of the army at large. The effect of such a decision would be to open on the British soldier all the mischief which the Statute of Frauds and the Wills Act, 1837, intended to guard against; such must be the case if the court holds that every soldier on full or half-pay may make a will by parol, or a will in writing without witnesses. B C D E F

The court must look to the principle intended to be adopted into this Act, as also into the Statute of Frauds. The words are "no soldier being in actual military service." These words must have some meaning; it cannot be that they would be added to the word "soldier" unless it were intended to impose some limitation as to the particular class of soldier to whom they were intended to apply. If it were intended to comprise in the exceptive clause all classes and grades of persons in the service, there could be no necessity for the insertion of the words "actual military service." The court must endeavour to see whether it cannot find some meaning for these words, and some reason for their insertion in the two Acts of Parliament. G H

In the very elaborate arguments addressed to the court by the learned counsel on both sides, the court has not been referred to any case where a judicial decision has been come to on this point, and, with the exception of a case to which the court itself had referred, and to which it will presently advert, the court is not aware of any case which has occurred with respect to the will of a soldier. The only decisions of which the court is aware are with respect to the corresponding part of the clause as to the wills of mariners or seamen, as to which some few cases have occurred, and I allude in particular to Earl of Euston v. Lord Seymour (1). That was a case in which the testator was commander-in-chief of the naval force at Jamaica, but lived on shore at the official residence; his family and establishment were on shore. In that case it was held that the testator did not come within the exceptive clause relating to mariners at sea, and, consequently, a nuncupative will made by him on shore was pronounced to be invalid, and the allegation propounding it was rejected. One or two other cases have occurred, in which that case I

A has been referred to, but, with these exceptions, I am not aware that the discussion on this section of the Act has gone further than a question on motion. The court has in some few cases, where the point admitted of no doubt, acted on the certificate of the War Office.

It has now become a matter of importance that this question should be solemnly determined as to the description of persons coming within the exception of s. 11 of the Wills Act. It certainly would have been a matter of some surprise that so few cases should have occurred in which it has been necessary to consider the effect of this clause, if the fact were not accounted for by the reflection of how unsafe a thing it is to trust to wills made by word of mouth when the mode of disposing of personal property, according to the law of England, is so simple, and requires so few solemnities, and when, as is quite manifest, a will by word of mouth may lead to fraud, or misapprehension. Consequently, most persons, even military testers, would prefer making their wills in writing instead of trusting to so unsafe a mode of disposing of their property. This consideration may, I think, fairly account for the paucity of cases of this description.

With regard to the construction to be put on the words of s. 11, how is the meaning of them to be ascertained? It was observed in argument—and as a general proposition it is undoubtedly true—that in construing a British Act of Parliament very little assistance can be derived from ancient or modern codes of other countries, but yet cases have occurred, and do occur in courts of law, where in interpreting an Act of Parliament, the context of which does not furnish the necessary information or precise meaning, the assistance of foreign codes from which the principle of that particular statute has been borrowed has been resorted to, in order to give the true interpretation of the Act. It cannot be denied that the principle of s. 11 was borrowed from the civil law—indeed that is not denied, it is admitted on all hands. It appears, from the preface to the life of SIR LEOLINE JENKINS [by WILLIAM WYNNE] that he claimed to himself some merit for having, during the preparation of the Statute of Frauds, obtained for the soldiers of the English army the full benefit of the testamentary privileges of the Roman army. Therefore, I think it quite clear that the principle of the exception was borrowed from the civil law, and that in order to ascertain the extent and meaning of the exception, the civil law may be fairly resorted to. It has become necessary to recur to this because the court was referred to a variety of writers on the text law and to many passages from the learned commentators on the text law; and it is well known that very subtle distinctions are to be found in the writings of the commentators.

I will not enter into a long discussion on the different points on which the commentators have treated, or on the conflict of laws in this respect. I have, however, thought it necessary to look into the commentators, to see to what extent, in respect to the "testamentum militare," they consider (at least to the extent of the text law), the strict testamentary law was dispensed with. As far as I can collect, the only distinction upon which they differ is whether the privilege extended to soldiers in quarters or in garrison "in stativis aut in hybernis." They all agree in this one particular, namely, that it was not every soldier, under every circumstance, who was entitled to this privilege, but that it was confined to those who were "expeditionibus occupati"; the only difference seeming to be what constituted expedition, whether a soldier profectus was to be considered in expeditione until he actually returned home, or whether the expedition was at an end when he went into garrison or winter quarters. It is true that in its origin the testamentary privilege extended to all soldiers. We have it so expressed in book 29 of the DIGEST, entitled "De testamento militis," which begins by stating that full and free power of making a will was first granted by Julius Cæsar: "Militibus liberam testamenti factionem primus quidem Julius Cæsar concessit." This, according to all the commentators, was the origin of the privilege of soldiers making wills without having a certain number of witnesses to attest them, and without the observance of other solemnities, and that the privilege had no existence before the time of Julius Cæsar. It goes on:

"sed ea concessio temporalis erat. Postea vero primus Titus dedit, post hoc Domitianus, postea Nerva plenissimam indulgentiam in milites contulit, eamque et Trajanus secutus est, et exinde mandatis inseri cœpit caput tale: caput ex mandatis." A

Having set forth with this in order to show how far general the privilege was in its origin, the passage proceeds :

"Cum in notitiam meam prolatum est subinde testamenta a commilitonibus relicta proferri, quæ possint in controversiam deduci, si ad diligentiam legum revocentur et observantiam: secutus animi mei integritudinem erga optimos fidelissimosque commilitones simplicitati eorum consulendum existimaui, ut quoquo modo testati fuissent, rata esset eorum voluntas. Faciant igitur testamenta quo modo volent, quo modo poterint, sufficiatque ad bonorum suorum divisionem faciendam nuda voluntas testatoris." B C

Nothing can be clearer than that this privilege in its origin extended to all ranks, and to the whole of the vast body of the Roman army. The interpretation in the glosses on the word "simplicitas" is want of skill in legal forms, and the term made use of by JUSTINIAN in the INSTITUTES (Lib. II, tit. xi) is "imperitia." In the gloss of GOTHOFRED (CORP. JUR. CIV.) this is inserted: "nisi domi sint tunc enim jure communi testari debent." D

So stood the law at the time of the DIGEST. Various limitations were afterwards imposed. In book 6 of the CODE (tit. 21, law 3) "De testamento Militis" is this passage :

"Quamquam militum testamenta juris vinculis non subjiciantur cum propter simplicitatem militarem." E

One observation in the gloss is: "Simplicitas militaris ut hic armatæ militiæ," another is: "arma magis quam leges scire miles præsumitur." The text goes on :

"quomodo velint et quomodo possint ea facere his concedatur; tamen in Valeriani quondam centurionis testamento institutio etiam jure communi concessit auctoritatem." F

In law 17 of the same title headed "Quando miles testatur quomodo vult," this is to be found :

"Ne quidam putarent in omni tempore licere militibus testamenta quomodo voluerint componere Sancimus his solis qui in expeditionibus occupati sunt." G

In the gloss (GOTHOFRED), is this passage :

"Idque sive sint in castris, sive in fossato, sive in hybernis, sive in præidiis, sive in stativis seu sedibus sedetis ac ædibus." H

Another gloss upon the word "expeditio" is, "sufficit ergo ut fiat in expeditione licet non in procinctu." Reference has been made to Cujacius (49th cap.), who says :

"cum autem quæritur an non aliter valeat testamentum jure militari quam si fiat in procinctu Respondeo etiam si non fiat in procinctu testamentum valere jure militari modo fiat in expeditione in castris in stativis." I

So that it was not, according to this commentator, absolutely necessary that the soldier should be in procinctu, that is, called out in preparation for battle, but the privilege existed when he was in castris aut in stativis, and the reason he assigns for this is :

"alioquin nihil distaret paganus a milite, nam et a pagano in procinctu in acie in hostico quoquo modo factum testamentum valet ratione pari."

According to Cujacius, soldiers, in quarters or in camp, might make wills, without observing the solemnities of law, but he says, "modo fiat in expeditione." Whether the privilege extended to all cases when a soldier was in castris aut in stativis might be a matter of some doubt, but it is not necessary to consider that question.

- A It cannot be said that General Drummond was either in castris, or in stativis; then, was he in expeditione?

CUJACIUS continues :

- B “Ergo qui in expeditione testatur miles in castris in fossato ut loquuntur, imo et qui in hybernis, ut meum iudicium est, in stativis, in præsiidiis jure militari testamentum facere potest; ac proinde non est necesse ut adhibeat legitimum numerum testium ut est in principio tituli de militari testamento ubi et unum testem sufficere Theophilus noster scripsit. Et quidem nullum testem necessario requiro, ac satis esse opinor si aliis probationibus legitimus constare possit de voluntate militis.”

- C Here again CUJACIUS repeats the use of the word “expeditio.” He seems to think that a soldier in castris, or in stativis, is not required to observe the solemnities of the testamentary law, but still he is of opinion, that he must be in expeditione. Then arises the question : What is the meaning of the word “expeditio?” According to CALVIN, in his LEXICON JURIDICUM, it is this :

- D “Expeditio proprie profectio cum expeditis militibus.” “Expediti milites vel in expeditionibus degentes dicuntur quicumque sint in ipso exercitu aut castris, id est eo loco quo reipublicæ causa est belli apparatus, seu in statione illi sint, seu in hybernis seu alicubi pro finibus imperii tuendis, imo quocunque loco sint militiæ causa, ut si Romæ sint ad defensionem urbis collocati et dispositi.”

Then it is argued from this :

- E “Falsum ergo est stationarios et limenarchas non recte testaturos jure militari quia non sint in expeditionibus.”

Then the authority of ULPIAN is referred to, who says, (lib. 1, s. ult. de bon. poss. ex test.) :

“Miles est etiamsi in nostro non est, et Nauarchi ac trierarchi classium jure militari testari possunt, et in classibus omnes remiges ac nautæ milites sunt.”

- F So far, then, as CALVIN is an authority, here is a definition of the word “expeditio.” So far, then, as I have gone, it is quite clear, from these passages from the DIGEST, the CODE, and the commentators generally that the privilege did not extend to soldiers of every description. They must be soldiers expeditionibus occupati, or called out to defend the city; this last case was of itself an exception, for it could not strictly be said to be “expeditio.” I find the words of the CODE thus
- G limited in book 2 of the INSTITUTES (tit. 11) :

- H “Supradicta diligens observatio in ordinandis testamentis, militibus propter nimiam imperitiam eorum constitutionibus principalibus remissa est. Nam quævis ii neque legitimum numerum testium adhibuerint neque aliam testamentorum solemnitatem observaverint recte nihilominus testantur, videlicet cum in expeditionibus occupati sunt : quod merito nostra constitutio introduxit.”

(The law referred to will be found in the CODE, c. 6, tit. 21) :

- I “Quoquo enim modo voluntas ejus suprema inveniatur, sive scripta, sive sine scriptura, valet testamentum ex voluntate ejus. Illis autem temporibus per quæ citra expeditionem necessitatem in aliis locis vel suis ædibus degunt, minime ad vindicandum tale privilegium adjuvantur.”

It is quite clear from this that the privilege of deviating from the general law was confined to those soldiers who were “expeditionibus occupati,” and that, if soldiers made wills at other times, they must comply with the requisites prescribed by the general Roman law to give operation to a will.

The same expressions are found in the same title and book of the Institutes (s. 3) :

“Sed hætenus hoc illis a principalibus constitutionibus conceditur quatenus militant et in castris degunt. Post missionem vero veterani vel extra castra alii si faciant adhuc militantes testamentum, communi omnium civium Romanorum jure id facere debent."

The veterani here spoken of were not, as has been surmised, analogous to the generals of the English army, but soldiers who had served their time, and been discharged propter honestam causam, but the important bearing of the passage is that it shows that the privilege was confined simply and entirely to soldiers expeditionibus occupati. There is a passage from VULTEIUS (Lib. 2, c. 10), which sums up the whole of the law on this subject. The title is, "De testamentis ordinandis." He says:

"Olim ante Justinianum hoc privilegium commune erat militibus omnibus sive in expeditione sive extra eam essent, sed Justinianus restrinxisse illud videtur ad milites eos qui in expeditione degerent. Non igitur existimandum est si testamentum est militis testamentum illud esse militare; nam sive jus quod ante Justinianum fuit, sive jus quod Justinianus postea introduxit spectes, multi sunt milites qui tamen non militant aut in expeditione degunt."

Nothing can be more clear than that, according to the Roman text law, this was not a privilege extending to all soldiers, but to those only who were circumstanced as I have mentioned.

I now come to consider the case with reference to the passages cited from SWINBURNE [ON TESTAMENTS AND LAST WILLS], whom undoubtedly the court will consider a very high authority. He speaks (Part 1, s. 13) of three sorts of privileged testaments, and first "Testamentum militis." Of this he says (p. 95):

"After we have viewed what privileges do belong to soldiers, it shall be expedient to show what manner of soldiers they be to whom these privileges are granted; 1st, Milites armati—2nd, Milites literarii—3rd, Milites cælestes."

He says:

"Concerning the first, they be such as lie safely in some castle, or place of defence, or besieged by the enemy, only in readiness to be employed in case of invasion or rebellion, and then they do not enjoy these military privileges, or else they be such as are in expedition or actual service of wars, and such are privileged, at least during the time of their expedition, whether they be employed by land or by water, and whether they be horsemen or footmen."

The words used in both Acts of Parliaments are as nearly as possible the same as those used by SWINBURNE in explaining the word "expedition." The probability is that the words of s. 23 of the Statute of Frauds, from which s. 11 of the present Act was taken, were borrowed from SWINBURNE. MR. BURGE, in his work, COMMENTARIES ON COLONIAL AND FOREIGN LAWS, vol. 4, p. 394, defines actual military service by the words "Qui in expeditionibus sunt." It has also been shown in argument that the codes of all countries in Europe seem to have limited the privilege in the same way. The following writers and laws have been cited, DONATUS, DONELLUS, PAUL and JOHN VOET, HUBER, HOSTIENSIS, GAIL, VIGLIUS, PUFFENDORF, the THEODOSIAN CODE, the FRENCH CODE. POTHIER—who, in his sixth book (tit. 16), says: "Soldiers in forts or garrisons cannot avail themselves of this law"—the SARDINIAN CODE, the law of Spain, where the expression is "en guerra actual," the ordinance of the Emperor Maximilian in 1512; the law of Bavaria, of Mecklenburgh, of Westphalia—in short it appears that in all countries the privilege is accompanied with limitations. In most it would seem that a military will was only good when made on the field of battle or marching against the enemy, and when made under these circumstances, it only remained good for three months after the soldier returned home, or arrived at a place where there was a consul or some person before whom a will might be made.

These are the authorities to which the court has thought it necessary to refer in order to show what was the principle of exempting the wills of soldiers from the stricter forms of testamentary law, and to show that the privilege was borrowed

A from the Roman law, and engrafted into our laws, and that it is confined to soldiers placed in the particular situations I have described. The court has also searched to find, if possible, any case in which a court of law has put a construction on the words "actual military service." The court has found none, and, therefore, must resort to principle to put an interpretation on words to which some meaning must be given. The court, at the commencement of this judgment, stated that there is

B one case in which the question has received, in this court, a certain degree of interpretation; it is Shearman v. Pyke (2). The following is the extract from DR. ANDREW'S note:

C "James Wakeford was enlisted as a soldier in the service of the East India Co., and went with Governor Pyke to St. Helena. He was employed in his service as cook, and he gave him wages besides his pay. In 1719 the governor left St. Helena to proceed to Bencoolen, but at Batavia they were informed that the factory at Bencoolen was cut off by the natives. They sailed from Batavia to Moco Moro, and thence to Madras, thence he proceeded to Bencoolen to re-establish the factory. About October, 1720, they returned to Moco Moro. In January, 1721, James Wakeford being ill of an ague, and fever, and flux, whereof he died in the hospital at Moco Moro, being asked by J. Potter and M. Sams to make his will, replied: 'I give all I have to my master, and I will give nothing from him, and I'll make no other will; he may dispose of it as he pleases.' On Jan. 22, two days after his death, the witnesses signed a schedule of the contents of the will, and made oath thereof at Moco Moro. Potter died on the passage. This will is propounded by Governor Pyke as a nuncupative will, and opposed by Shearman, one of the next-of-kin."

E The arguments are given shortly.

"The [Statute of Frauds] s. 23, does not extend to every soldier in actual military service, or to every mariner or seaman being at sea; the exception is not restrained to an engagement, it is not from the imminence of the danger, but from their state and condition, being supposed to be ignorant and destitute of assistance. By the civil law, a will made jure militari continued good a year; if the danger were the only reason, that ceasing the will would become void. INSTIT. Bk. 2, tit. 2, s. 3.—Quatenus militans et in castris degunt."

F In point of fact the arguments were the same as on the present occasion. CALVIN'S definition of the word expeditio, was referred to, as was also the passage in CUJACIUS. On the other hand, the argument for the next-of-kin was this: "The G court, upon the plea, directed they should set forth the expedition."

It seems from this that the allegation propounding the nuncupative will had been objected to, as not setting forth the expedition, and the court had directed it to be set forth:

H "It must be under actual engagement, attended with danger, otherwise mounting guard at Whitehall, would be sufficient; the expedition was over before he was in the hospital; refer to Key v. Jordan (3), 1712. A mariner made a nuncupative will at land; he was going on board next day, not allowed the privilege."

The words of the court, in pronouncing sentence, are these:

I "It is agreed, the will cannot be good unless within the privilege. A mariner on shore is not within the statute. Those who are enlisted in the service of the company have the same privilege as those in the service of the Crown, and though he acted as cook, it does not take away the privilege of the soldier. He was not only a soldier, but was upon an expedition. The proof is not clear whether the expedition was over or not, one witness swears he died on the passage, he was certainly engaged in the service."

The will was pronounced for. It appears doubtful on what particular grounds the decision turned, whether on the ground that the privilege extended to all persons in the service, or whether that the expedition was not over, but was returning, A when he fell ill, and died in the hospital. The court puts it thus :

"One witness swears he died on the passage; he was certainly engaged in the service."

This decision, so far as it goes, would have been an authority precisely in point B if the will had been pronounced for on the ground that the testator was a soldier, on an expedition, and died on the passage. Unquestionably, in such case, the will was privileged, but, unfortunately, the language of the judgment renders it doubtful on what the judgment really turned. The judge was DR. BETTESWORTH. He evidently considered that the question had never received a decision. It also appears that, in the first instance, he had directed the allegation to be reformed, by setting forth the expedition on which the deceased was engaged.

Being of opinion from the result of the investigation of the authorities that the C principle of the exemption contained in s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, was adopted from the Roman law, I think it was adopted with the limitations to which I have adverted, and that by the insertion of the words "actual military service," the privilege, as respects the British soldier, is confined to those who are on an expedition. The question, then, comes to be considered: What was the situation D of Major-General Drummond at the time when he made his will? That is to be found in art. 5 of the allegation propounding the will. It is there stated that the general was "liable to be sent abroad"—so is every soldier in the service; and that he was "subject to be tried by a court-martial,"—so is every officer and soldier in the service. On these grounds I think this will not entitled to probate. It is not attested in manner and form prescribed as to all wills which bear date after E
Jan. 1, 1838, and it is not within the exception of s. 11 of the statute, that is, it is not made by a soldier "in actual military service." Therefore, I am of opinion that this allegation cannot be admitted to proof, and, accordingly, I reject it.

Allegation rejected.

CALEDONIAN RAIL. CO. v. SPROT

Land—Right to support—Railway—Conveyance of surface reserving mines and right to work them—Implied obligation to give surface subjacent and adjacent support.

A conveyance of the surface of land for a particular purpose, such as the construction of a railway, gives to the grantee an implied right to all reasonable subjacent and adjacent support. A person who has granted part of his land, reserving, for instance, his mines under the land conveyed, with liberty to win and work the minerals, must not so deal with the land which he retains, either subjacent or adjacent to the works of the person or body acquiring the land, as to cause that which he has granted to sink or fall. In reserving mines and the right to work them he must be understood to have reserved them only so far as he could work the mines consistently with the grant he has made. How far adjacent support must extend is a question depending on the circumstances of each case, but all that a grantor can reasonably be considered to grant or warrant is such measure of support, subjacent and adjacent, as is necessary for the land in its condition at the time of the grant or in the state for the purpose of putting it into which the grant is made.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Court of Session in an action brought by the respondent for a declaration that he was entitled to damages for loss sustained by him owing to the appellants preventing him from working a mine under their railway and refusing to pay him any compensation.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Q.C., Rolt, Q.C., and Anderson, Q.C., for the appellants.

Sir Richard Bethell, Q.C., R. Palmer, Q.C., and A. Brown for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

June 16, 1856. LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., read the following opinion.—This appeal arose out of an action which had been brought by the respondent against the appellants, the object of which was to compel them to purchase certain minerals belonging to him, situate under and near the line of their railway. Several Acts of Parliament came in question in this case; first, the original Act, 7 Geo. 4, c. ciii, which is an Act for making a railway from the Monkland and Kirkintilloch Railway by Garnkirk to Glasgow. Under that Act there were the usual powers enabling the company to be incorporated for the purchase of lands; and, pursuant to the powers given by that Act, on Dec. 12, 1834, between eight and nine years after the passing of the Act, the respondent sold to the company, in consideration of a sum of £620, some land of his over which the railway was to pass, reserving, however, the minerals. Then there passed some amending Acts. By an Act of 1844 the name of the company was changed, and it was called the Glasgow, Garnkirk and Coatbridge Rail. Co. There passed, on July 21, 1845, the Scottish General Railway Clauses Act. In the same year an Act was passed, by which the Caledonian Rail. Co. was incorporated; and then, in 1846, an Act enabling the Caledonian Rail. Co. to purchase the Glasgow, Garnkirk and Coatbridge Railway. In 1848 the respondent, having sold his land to the original company, but having reserved to himself the mines, was proceeding to work certain mines under and near the line of railway when, on Aug. 17, 1848, he received a notice from the company calling upon him to desist from what he was proceeding to do. Having set forth the rights of the company, the summons in the present action states this :

“Under these circumstances the plaintiff proceeded with a working of the fire-clay and other minerals in his said lands of Garnkirk in due and ordinary course, until he was interrupted by the Caledonian Rail. Co. On or about Aug. 17, 1848, the agents for the company addressed a letter to the manager at the Garnkirk works, intimating that they had received a report from their engineer that the works then in the course of being carried on in the fire-clay mines under the line of the Garnkirk Railway at the Garnkirk brick-works were of a nature to endanger the safety of the railway, and calling upon the proprietors of the minerals to find security to the company for all damage, interruption of traffic, and other injury which might result to the company, before any further workings were proceeded with.”

Eventually, the appellants persisting in forbidding the respondent to work the mines, and the respondent persisting that he had a right to work them, the respondent brought the action, out of which the present appeal arose, in which he concludes :

“Therefore, it ought and should be found and declared by decree of the Lords of our council and session, that the said Caledonian Rail. Co., or the said

- A Glasgow, Garnkirk, and Coatbridge Rail. Co., or either of them, defenders, have no right of property in the minerals in the lands of Garnkirk, situated under and adjacent to the Glasgow, Garnkirk, and Coatbridge Railway, or any part thereof; but that the property of the said minerals is still vested in and belongs to the plaintiff, subject to any right of purchase, or right to prevent the working thereof on making compensation for the same, competent to the
- B said defendants or either of them under the said Acts of Parliament. Further it ought and should be found and declared by decree aforesaid, that the defenders are not entitled to require or compel the plaintiff to desist from working the minerals, or any part thereof, without paying to the plaintiff and his tenants the value of the minerals which they so require to be left unwrought, or compensating the plaintiff and his tenants for the loss occasioned to him by leaving the same unwrought. And, further, it ought and should be found and declared
- C by decree aforesaid, that the proviso or enactment in s. 11 of the Act 7 Geo. 4, c. ciii, whereby it is declared that it shall not be lawful to, or in the power of any proprietor to whom satisfaction has been made as therein mentioned, and who has reserved his right to the minerals in the lands for which such satisfaction has been made, to work, win, or away take the said minerals, without
- D giving previous security to the Glasgow and Garnkirk Rail. Co. or their successors, for damage, interruption of traffic, and other injury resulting to the said company and their said undertaking, does not in any respect apply to the minerals in the lands adjacent to the railway belonging to the plaintiff, which were not conveyed or included in the conveyance granted by him to the railway company in 1834; and notwithstanding the proviso or enactment in the said statute, and the terms of the said conveyance, the plaintiff is entitled to obtain compensation from the defendants or either of them, for all minerals under or
- E adjacent to the line of railway which were not purchased by the railway company or their successors, and which the plaintiff or his tenants are prevented from working by reason of the necessity of maintaining the railway in a state of security, or by reason of the restriction imposed upon him not to injure the
- F railway; and further, it ought and should be found and declared by decree aforesaid that the plaintiff is entitled to obtain full compensation from the defendants, the Caledonian Rail. Co. and other companies or either of them, for the whole minerals in the lands of Garnkirk not purchased by the railway company or their successors, and which cannot be wrought without danger to the railway and works, and that within the limits specified in the report of Mr. Robson the engineer of the company, dated Aug. 3, 1848, or as the same may be ascer-
- G tained in the course of the proceedings to follow hereon."

That being the summons, and there having been a statement in answer, eventually on March 8, 1851, the Lord Ordinary pronounced a decree dismissing the suit, having come to the conclusion that the respondent, by the sale to the appellants

H of his lands, although he reserved the minerals, had nevertheless precluded himself from working the minerals either under or adjacent to the railway, so as to prejudice the railway.

That decision of the Lord Ordinary was brought by way of an appeal to the Court of Session, and they took this course. Before answer and under express reservation of all pleas or questions competent to the parties under the record,

I they remitted the case to Mr. Leslie and Mr. Lonsdale, the one a civil engineer and the other a mining engineer "to examine the subjects and to inquire and report, first, whether, having reference to the nature of the railway which was made under the powers of the original Acts," the minerals under the railway could have been worked with safety to the railway and with a reasonable prospect of advantage to the proprietor, subject to the obligation of fair security, in terms of the original Act: and, secondly, whether, and in what respects, and to what extent, the alterations made in the uses and structure of the railway by or under authority of the Acts of 1844, 1845 and 1846, or any of them, materially affected the practicability of working the minerals. Those gentlemen made the following report:

"That having reference to the nature of the railway made under the powers of the original Acts, the minerals could not have been worked with safety to the railway as they were in the habit of being worked; but that fully one-third or nearly one-half of the fire-clay could have been taken out from or under, or for sixty feet on each side of the centre of the railway by single mines."

and so on, which is not the ordinary way of working; and secondly "that the railway being thus secured, it is of no consequence to the stowed mines or cased pillars, how many or how frequent the trains are."

They added:

"The reporters do not think that the increased traffic or the alterations of the structure and uses of the railway have materially affected the practicability of working the minerals under and adjacent to the railway."

When that report was brought before the First Division of the Court of Session, they took a different view from that which had been taken by the Lord Ordinary. They found that the consideration paid to the respondent did not include compensation for the loss of the minerals, and that he was entitled to work the minerals unless the company thought fit to purchase them. From that decision the present appeal was brought.

The respondent by his conveyance, dated Dec. 12, 1834, conveyed to the original Garnkirk company the portion of his land required for the line of the company in consideration of a sum of money agreed on as a price, and then paid to him. The conveyance was expressly made for the purpose of the land conveyed being used as a railway. He, however, reserved all mines under the land so conveyed, with full liberty to win and work the minerals. Independently of any provisions contained in the Act of Parliament, the effect of that conveyance was to convey the land to be covered by the railway to the company, together with a right to all reasonable subjacent and adjacent support. A right to such support is a right necessarily connected with the subject-matter of the grant. If the owners of a house were to convey the upper storey to a purchaser reserving all below the upper storey, the purchaser would, on general principles, have a right to prevent the owner of the lower stories from interfering with the walls and beams upon which the upper storey rested, so as to prevent them from affording proper support. The same principle applies to the case of adjacent support, so far, at all events, as to prevent a person who has granted a part of his land from so dealing with that which he retains as to cause what he has granted to sink or fall. How far such adjacent support must extend is a question which, in each particular case, will depend on its own special circumstances. If the line dividing that which is granted from that which is retained traversed a quarry of hard stone or marble, it may be that no adjacent support at all is necessary. If, on the other hand, it traverses a bed of sand or marsh, or a loose gravelly soil, it may be that a considerable breadth of support is necessary to prevent the land granted from falling away upon the soil of what is retained. Again, if the surface of the land granted is merely a common meadow or a ploughed field, the necessity for support will probably be much less than if it were covered with buildings or trees; and it must be further observed that all which a grantor can reasonably be considered to grant or warrant is such measure of support, subjacent and adjacent, as is necessary for the land in its condition at the time of the grant or in the state for the purpose of putting it into which the grant is made. Thus, if I grant a meadow to another, retaining both the minerals under it and also the adjacent lands, I am bound so to work my mines and to dig my adjoining land, as not to cause the meadow to sink or fall over;

- A but if the grantee thinks fit to build a house on the edge of the land he has acquired, he cannot complain of my working or digging if, by reason of the additional weight he has put on the land, they cause his house to fall. If, indeed, the grant is made expressly to enable the grantee to build his house on the land granted, then there is an implied warrant of support, subjacent and adjacent, as if the house had already existed.
- B Applying these principles to this case, it is clear that by the effect of the conveyance of Dec. 12, 1834, the Garnkirk company acquired a right to the surface of the ground traversed by the railway, together with a right, as against the respondent, to such subjacent and adjacent support as was necessary for enabling them to maintain and work the railway. The conveyance is in these terms :
- C "I, Mark Sprot, esquire, of Garnkirk, considering that in the year 1826, by Act of Parliament, 7 Geo. 4, c. ciii, the Garnkirk and Glasgow Rail. Co. was incorporated, and that it was agreed between me and the committee or proprietors of said railway that the value of the land belonging to me to be occupied by the said railway, as well as all damage done to my property, should be ascertained by David Leighton, then factor at Coltness . . ."

- D Then there is a calculation of the interest and certain other damages, making altogether £624 (the original purchase-money having been only £379). The conveyance proceeds thus :

- E "And in consideration of the aforesaid sum of £379 being the specific and agreed on value of the land hereby conveyed, I, the said Mark Sprot, do by these presents grant and convey to the said company of proprietors, but always for the said railway and works thereto belonging and not otherwise, all and whole that portion of my estate described . . . declaring that I shall have full power to take into my own hands the slopes or banks on that portion of the line betwixt the parish and the crossing of the Cumberwauld Road, at or near Stepps, for the purpose of feuing or otherwise, under such conditions and restrictions always as shall not interfere with the due and regular operations
- F of the said railway, I, the said Mark Sprot, and my foresaids paying such an annual value for said slopes and banks as may be fixed by the persons mutually chosen; and I hereby warrant this conveyance at all hands and against all mortals as law will, and declare that all fees, teind and other parish and public burdens whatsoever affecting the lands hereby conveyed, up to the term of Martinmas, 1833, have been paid, my said disponees being obliged to pay whatever proportion of such burdens have fallen due since, or may hereafter fall due, and be held as applicable to the said lands, reserving always to me, my heirs and successors, the whole powers and privileges of access to or crossing the said railway, and other ways conferred by the said recited Acts on the landed proprietors whose lands are intersected; also, always reserving to me,
- G and my heirs and successors, the whole mines and minerals of whatsoever description within the said lands hereby conveyed, and full power and liberty to us, or any person authorised by us, to search for, win and carry away the same, and to make acqueducts . . ."
- H

- Subject to the rights thus given to the company, the respondent retained a right to work the minerals under and adjoining the line, subject only as to the minerals
- I under the line to the obligation of giving the security created by the first Act to which I have referred.

Starting, then, from this proposition, the next question is: Have the rights of each party been affected by the several Acts of Parliament relating to the railway? [His LORDSHIP examined the provisions of these private Acts in some detail, and continued:] It appears, from an examination of all these Acts that the rights acquired by the original company by virtue of the conveyance of Dec. 12, 1834, remained unaffected up to the time of their final transfer to the Caledonian company, and as the respondent rests his claim to relief on the ground that he is entitled by virtue of the reservation of mines contained in his conveyance of 1834 to work those mines adjoining the railway without regard to the question whether by so doing he will be damaging the necessary support of the railway, and that the company can only prevent his doing so by purchasing the mines, I have only to add, having already explained the grounds on which I conceive this view of the case to be incorrect, that I think the Lord Ordinary was right when he held the plea was good.

I am aware that I adopt the view of the Lord Ordinary in opposition to the opinion of the four judges of the First Division of the Court of Session who concurred in reversing his decision. Those able judges seem to me to have overlooked or not to have given due weight to the effect of the conveyance of 1834. If I am right in saying that by that conveyance the respondent conveyed to the company not only the land to be covered by the railway, but also, by implication, the right to all necessary support, then he cannot, by reason of his having reserved the mines, derogate from his own conveyance by removing that support. In reserving mines he must be understood to have reserved them so far only as he could work them consistently with the grant he had made to the company. The judges of the court below have overlooked the principle, and in so doing have been led to an erroneous conclusion.

The subject of the right of the owners of the surface to adequate subjacent and adjacent support has, on several recent occasions, been discussed in the English courts. The principles which there govern the decisions were not derived from any peculiarities of the English law, but rested on grounds common to the Scottish and, as I believe, to every other system of jurisprudence. They were considered in Harris v. Ryding (1), and very fully developed in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, delivered by LORD CAMPBELL, in Humphries v. Brogden (2). It may be proper that I should notice an argument relied on to some extent, namely, that the railway originally contemplated was not one on which the traffic would be equal to that which now exists, so that the support contemplated could not have been so great as that which is now required. To that I think there are two answers: first, when the respondent granted his land for the avowed purpose of enabling the disponees to make a railway without any limitation as to its nature, I think he must be understood to have warranted proper support, however the railway might be used, or to whatever purpose it might be applied; and secondly, the gentlemen to whom the Court of Session referred this very question expressly say, that neither increased traffic nor the alteration of the structure or uses of the railway have materially affected the practicability of working the minerals.

I may also add that although this judgment and the reasons I have given for it are my own, they are to be considered likewise as those of my noble and learned friend LORD BROUGHAM, to whom I communicated the judgment, and who has authorised me to express his entire concurrence in it.

Appeal allowed.

FENN AND ANOTHER v. BITTLESTON

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Pollock, C.B., Parke, Alderson and Platt, BB.), June 5, November 4, December 5, 1851]

155 E.R. 895]

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—Sale of goods—Goods left in possession of bankrupt conditional on payment of interest for loan.
Bailment—Determination—Sale of chattels bailed.

By a deed dated Sept. 28, 1845, M. conveyed certain chattels to R. absolutely, with the proviso that, if M. should pay to R. £1,678 on Mar. 22, 1850, or at such earlier date as R. should appoint by giving twenty-four days' notice to M., and should pay interest in the meantime, the conveyance should be void, and it was thereby agreed that until default in payment of the principal sum or interest it should be lawful for M., his executors or administrators, to hold and enjoy the chattels. On Dec. 13, 1849, M. became bankrupt, and on Feb. 19, 1850, his assignees sold the chattels absolutely.

Held: the sale by the assignees was equivalent to a sale by M. himself; it destroyed the bailment of the goods; and trover would lie in an action by the assignees of R. against M.'s assignees for the conversion of the goods during the term.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendants to set aside a verdict for the plaintiffs and enter a nonsuit in an action of trover for household goods, on the ground that the plaintiffs had no right to recover the chattels, the subject of the action, as against the defendants. E

At the trial of the action at Guildhall before POLLOCK, C.B., the plaintiffs claimed to recover the value of goods which had been conveyed to them by one Rhodes to whom one Malpas had conveyed them by a deed dated Sept. 28, 1845, the terms of which are set out in the judgment. It appeared that the goods had been subsequently seized and sold by the defendants who were the assignees of Malpas on his bankruptcy on Dec. 13, 1849, as being in the reputed ownership of the bankrupt at the time of his bankruptcy. The defendants pleaded Not Guilty and Not Possessed and issues were joined on these pleas. POLLOCK, C.B., directed a verdict for the plaintiffs for the value of the goods with leave to the defendants to move to set aside the verdict and enter a nonsuit. The defendants obtained the rule already mentioned. F

Hoggins and Cowling showed cause against the rule. G

Knowles, Crompton and Aspland supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 5, 1851. PARKE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—This case was argued before us in last term on showing cause against a rule for setting aside a verdict for the plaintiff and entering a nonsuit, on the ground that the plaintiffs had no right to recover the chattels, the subject of the action in trover against the defendants, the assignees of a bankrupt named Malpas. H

Malpas and a person named Rhodes had married sisters, and were entitled in respect of their respective wives to distribute shares of the effects of their mother, who had died intestate. Malpas, the bankrupt, and his wife had carried on business with those effects and on an account and division taking place between Malpas and Rhodes Malpas was found indebted in £1,678 and upwards to Rhodes, and thereupon executed to him a mortgage of the goods and chattels in question in this action on Sept. 28, 1845. By the mortgage deed Malpas conveyed to Rhodes absolutely, subject to a proviso that if Malpas should pay Rhodes £1,678 on Mar. 22, 1850, or at such earlier days or times as Rhodes should appoint, by giving twenty-four days' notice to Malpas and should pay interest in the meantime, the conveyance should be void, and it was agreed between the parties that until default I

A should be made in the payment of the principal sum of £1,678 at the time before specified, or the interest, after fourteen days' notice, it should be lawful for Malpas, his executors and administrators, to hold and enjoy the chattels. Malpas continued to keep possession of the chattels according to the agreement until Dec. 13, 1849, when he became bankrupt, and his assignees, who were the defendants, on Feb. 19, 1850, sold the whole of them absolutely, not merely the bankrupt's interest. No demand was made by Rhodes or the plaintiffs for the principal money or interest in the meantime from Malpas. Rhodes, after the execution of the deed, assigned his effects to the plaintiffs.

It was contended, on behalf of the defendants, that by the covenants in the deed Rhodes gave an interest in the chattels in the nature of a demise until Mar. 22, 1850, defeasible by notice, according to the terms of the deed, to pay at an earlier period; consequently, that at the time of the conversion by the sale on Feb. 19, 1850, the plaintiffs, the assignees of Rhodes, had no present right of possession, and, therefore could not maintain an action of trover on the principles laid down in Gordon v. Harper (1) and Bradley v. Copley (2). The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contended that no interest at any time passed by the deed to Malpas, but that the covenant for enjoyment by Malpas either operated as a mere covenant, or, at most, as a bailment to hold at will; and if so, Rhodes might maintain an action of trover against the defendants.

We think the effect of the agreement of the parties in this case was to give not a mere possession and use of the chattels to Malpas as bailee, but the right of possession and use for the term ending Mar. 22, 1850, defeasible by nonpayment of the principal on twenty-four days' notice, and nonpayment of the interest in the meantime. The duration of the time of holding was not uncertain, as it would have been had it been only until such notice had been given, and in that case it might have been a term for life, which would not be the case of a demise of land, for want of livery of seizin. But it has a certain limit which it cannot exceed, namely Mar. 22, 1850. It is, therefore, good as a grant of a term defeasible, as suggested by Mr. PRESTON, in his commentary on the passage in SHEPHERD'S TOUCHSTONE, 272. It is too late to contend that the provision as to possession is a mere covenant after the cases on this subject, concluding with Bradley v. Copley (2). If, therefore, these goods had been simply taken by a third person out of Malpas's custody during the term stipulated for, no action of trover could have been maintained, because the plaintiffs would have had no present right to the possession. Gordon v. Harper (1) and Bradley v. Copley (2) would certainly have applied. But counsel for the plaintiffs contended that if the bailment was for that term it was put an end to by the act of the defendants, the assignees, whose act for this purpose is the same as that of Malpas himself, in selling the chattels themselves absolutely, before Mar. 22, 1850, and so preventing him from returning them at the end of the term, and that such sale is itself a conversion; and we are of that opinion.

H There is no reported case exactly like the present. In Bryant v. Wardell (3), the chattels were bailed for a time certain, and trover was held to lie by the bailor, because the bailee had done what was equivalent to the destruction of the chattels, and so brought himself within the principle laid down by LORD COKE in Co. Litt. 71a, namely,

I "That if one lends oxen to another to plough his lands, and he kills them, the owner may have trespass or trespass on the case at his election."

In some, the bailment has not been for a time certain. In Youl v. Harbottle (4), where a carrier was held liable in trover for misdelivery. So in Wilkinson v. King (5), Loeschman v. Machin (6) and Cooper v. Willomatt (7), it rather seems that the bailment was for a time certain, that is in each case from week to week, but no distinction appears to have been made by the court between such bailment and one at will. But it was held that the act of the bailee in doing an act entirely inconsistent with the terms of the bailment, although not amounting to a destruction of the chattel, was a termination of the lawful bailment, and caused the possessory title to revert to the bailor, and entitled him to maintain an action of trover. A

It is true that if this had been done by the bailee animo furandi, and the entire chattel had not been in different portions, but the entire chattel disposed of at one time, it would not have been punishable as a larceny, because, being lawfully in possession of the chattel, the taking it could not be either a trespass vi et armis or felony, unless the nature of the article had been changed; as by breaking open the bail, and also, with the same consequences, according to the recent decisions, disposing of it in different portions. The reason for which distinction is somewhat subtle, but is fully explained in the YEAR BOOK, 13 Edw. 4, fol. 99b, namely, that the possession of the article in its original state was with the consent of the bailor, and, therefore, lawful, but there was no consent in the possession of the article in its altered state, so that, after its alteration, the bailment was determined. But, although the delivery of chattels to a third person in their entire state would not have been felony, at all events, the delivery under an absolute sale was wrongful, and the contract between those parties never meant to authorise Malpas, his executors and administrators (and they alone are mentioned, and not his assigns), to do more than use the chattels, and not to give the use to a third person, certainly not for a longer period than his own term. The transfer of the property absolutely to a stranger was, therefore, unquestionably wrong, and it operated like a disclaimer of tenancy at common law. We are of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, and the rule must be discharged. B C D

MITFORD v. REYNOLDS

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Shadwell, V.-C.), February 16, 24, 1848]

12 Jur. 197; 60 E.R. 812]

Will—Gift—Failure—Failure of gift for specified purpose—Right of residuary beneficiary to property. G

A testator directed that a certain piece of land should be purchased by his executors for the purpose of erecting a monument for the reception of his remains and those of certain relatives. He then gave the rest of his property (after payment of certain legacies) for charitable purposes. The owner of the land refused to sell it.

Held: the failure of the gift for the purchase of the land enured for the benefit of the residuary fund; and, subject to the payment of the testator's debts and legacies, his whole estate was held for the charitable purposes specified in his will. H

Action to determine whether, under the will of the testator, Mitford, the effect of the failure of a bequest for the purchase of certain land which the owner thereof would not sell enured for the benefit of the residuary fund (which was given for charitable purposes) or for the benefit of the widow and next-of-kin under the Statute of Distributions [now Administration of Estates Act, 1925].

Mitford, who had formerly been a judge in India, and had amassed a considerable fortune, made his will, whereby, among other matters, he directed his executors or administrators to purchase and prepare, for the reception of his own remains and those of his father, mother, and sister, who were buried in the church of Chipping Ongar, in Essex, a piece of ground known by the appellation of the Mount, which adjoined the property of a gentleman by the name of Evans, and to erect on the summit a suitable and durable monument, planting the sides with cedars and cypress-trees, that it might be ornamental to the town—the expenses of which were to be paid out of the surplus property of the testator, after paying certain legacies before mentioned—and although he was aware that the Mount might not be consecrated, it was the testator's wish that his intentions should be carried out immediately after his decease. He then gave the remainder of his property, of what kind soever (after making certain payments in the will specified) to the government of Bengal, to be appropriated for charitable purposes at Dacca in Bengal, for the benefit of the native inhabitants of that province, as they or the government might deem to be most conducive to effectuate that purpose. The testator having died in the year 1886, and a doubt having arisen upon these two clauses in the will marked as the eighth and ninth clauses, his widow filed her bill in the present suit for the purpose of having the latter bequest declared void, and the former direction as to the mausoleum illegal, and praying also an injunction to restrain the executors from proceeding to carry out the directions contained in the will.

The widow also, together with the testator's next-of-kin, claimed the residuary property as undisposed of under the Statute of Distributions. Upon the original hearing of the cause before the vice-chancellor, his Honour had decreed that the charitable bequests to the native inhabitants of Dacca were good and valid, and directed the usual inquiries to be taken. This decree of his Honour was appealed from to LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., who refused to decide the question raised by it until the inquiries directed by the decree should have been made. The Master having made his report the appeal was then heard by LORD LYNTHURST, L.C. (1 Ph. 185), who confirmed the decree, but directed the Master to inquire what would be the expense of erecting the monument. The Master accordingly made his report, from which it appeared that the cost of the monument would amount to about £1,269. This finding, however, was afterwards proved to be unnecessary, from its having in the meantime been discovered that the owner of the Mount would not part with it, and the Master reported accordingly.

The cause now came on upon further directions and it was contended on behalf of the widow and next-of-kin, that as the testator's directions with respect to the monument failed from the circumstance of the owner of the property not being willing to sell it, the gift of the residue for the charitable purposes, which, in fact, formed part of the same fund out of which the monument was to be purchased, also became inoperative. For the other parties it was contended, that SIR WILLIAM GRANT had laid it down that the gift of a residue in general terms included in it all previous bequests that had failed of taking effect; and there being in this case a bequest of the general residuary property, the only way in which that bequest was affected must be considered in no other manner than beneficially. It was also suggested in the argument, that the direction as to the removal of the remains of the testator's relatives was contrary to public policy, and that, in whatever way A considered, that bequest failing only operated in favour of the inhabitants of Dacca.

SHADWELL, V.-C.—In this case, I thought it right, before I decided what seems to be the last point in the cause, to read over the will and all the other papers in the cause, in order that I might see what had been done in it. MR. PHILLIPS, in his report of the case upon the first question, mentions (1 Ph. at pp. 187, 188) that, when an appeal was presented to LORD COTTENHAM against the decree which I originally made in 1838, his Lordship did not think fit to express any opinion upon the point which I had decided; and, as I understand, made no order except that, in addition to the inquiries directed by my decree of 1838, he directed one special inquiry, upon a point which was not raised when the cause was before me, and which seems to have been answered by the separate report of the Master. The Master, in pursuance of my decree, made a general report as to debts, legacies, etc., but did not notice his separate report. The appeal came before LORD LYN- D HURST in 1842, and his Lordship declared that the bequest contained in the ninth clause of the will, was a good charitable bequest. That is the whole of his Lord- ship's declaration with respect to that bequest, and, therefore, it must be taken to be a good bequest under all circumstances. With respect to the eighth clause, his Lordship, on the cause coming on to be heard before him for further directions, ordered the Master to inquire and state what sum would be reasonably required for the purpose of carrying into effect the direction of the testator which was given in that clause. His Lordship then states, at length, the words of the eighth clause, and then goes on to say:

"But such inquiry is to be without prejudice to any question as to the validity of the last-mentioned bequest."

It is quite plain, therefore, that his Lordship did mean that any declaration that might be made with respect to the eighth clause, should depend upon other circum- stances than those which appear on the face of the bequest itself.

Then the Master made a report (certainly of a very singular kind) to which exceptions were taken. LORD LYN DHURST thought it right neither to allow nor to disallow those exceptions; but directed the Master, not to review his report, but to inquire and state on what terms, if any, the owner of the land called the Mount, would sell it. In obedience to that order, the Master has made a report which is, in substance, that Sir John Swinburn, the owner of the Mount, will not sell it: and the consequence is that the eighth clause wholly fails.

That being the case, I was very much pressed, by counsel for the next-of-kin, to hold that the ninth clause also fails. I do not, however, think that I am at liberty to say so. For LORD LYN DHURST seems to me to have concluded the question; inasmuch as, when he made the order with respect to the eighth clause, he expressly declared that it should be without prejudice to any question as to the validity of the bequest contained therein: but, when he made the order as to the ninth clause, he finally, absolutely and without any qualification, declared that the bequest contained in that clause, was a good charitable bequest; and it cannot be a good charitable bequest without being a good bequest. That bequest then being good, and the bequest contained in the eighth clause totally failing, that portion of the personal estate which might have been required to answer the purposes of the eighth clause, necessarily falls into that which is the subject of the ninth clause. The same language, you will observe, is not used there, as is used in the eighth

A clause: but the remainder of his property, is the expression used. The language of the eighth clause (which seems to have been, in some measure, the subject of criticism upon the discussion before LORD LYNTHURST) after giving the direction to purchase the Mount, was this:

B "the expenses whereof for the purchase, the construction of the monument, etc., are to be met and provided from the surplus of property that will and may be found after the payment and discharge shall have been made of the above legacies and bequests, etc.: and, though aware that the monument-mount may not be consecrated, I direct and expressly will and command that this injunction of the place for final interment, be absolutely attended to and carried into instant effect and completion."

C These are the special words which are used in the eighth clause: and the fair inference from them is that the testator did not mean that, in order that there might be this unconsecrated re-burial of those who were dear to him and an unconsecrated burial of himself, those legacies should be disappointed; and, therefore, he says that the expenses are to be provided from the surplus property that will and may be found after the payment and discharge shall have been made of the above legacies, bequests, etc. But, when you come to the ninth clause, it is a simple bequest:

E "I will, devise, give, and bequeath the remainder of my property, of whatsoever kind and description and that may arise from the sale of my effects, after deducting the annual amount that will be requisite to defray the keep of my horses."

F Therefore, it appears to me that the matter is concluded. And, as I find it now established, by the Master's report, that the bequest in the eighth clause has totally failed, because the Mount cannot be purchased, it follows, as a legitimate consequence from the decree of LORD LYNTHURST, that the order to be made must be one which, after making provision for the horses and for the payment of such legacies (if any) as remain to be paid and directing the costs to be paid, will order the residue to be paid over to Lord Auckland, who, as I understand, it is conventionally agreed, for the purpose of this suit, shall represent the government in India.

G That is my opinion in consequence of what LORD LYNTHURST has decided. But, if he had not so decided, I should have been of the same opinion. For I have considered, very attentively, those three cases, Chapman v. Brown (1), A.-G. v. Davies (2), and A.-G. v. Hinxman (3), and the conclusion which I have arrived at, is that they do not affect the present case, because, in this case, there is no such implication of the subject-matter of the ninth bequest with the subject-matter of the eighth, as to make it a necessary consequence that, if the eighth fails, the ninth fails. Suppose that a testator were to say that, after payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts and legacies, the residue of his property should go to A.B.: and then suppose that the testator were to be drowned at sea; in which case there could be no funeral expenses. Would anybody in Westminster Hall say that, because there was no interment, and, therefore, there could be no funeral expenses, the gift of the residue could not take effect? It seems to me that, in effect, A.-G. v. Hinxman (3), as far as it goes, is an authority in favour of the opinion which I have formed, if authority were wanting, which I deny; because I consider the point to be concluded by the general law of the land. In A.-G. v. Hinxman (3), it was held, as a matter of course, that, because the particular charity failed, what would have been appropriated to it, fell into the residue: that is, not for the benefit of the next-of-kin, for they were not parties to the suit, but for the benefit of a person of the name of King, who was the legatee of the residue.

I I admit, with respect to Chapman v. Brown (1), that the Master of the Rolls did hold that the ultimate disposition of the residue was so implicated with that which preceded it, that the one could not be separated from the other. But I have read the eighth clause in the will now before me, most attentively, and I cannot see that there is anything whatever which affects the validity of the bequest in the ninth clause, owing to the circumstance that the bequest in the eighth clause has wholly failed, not on account of any matter of law, but on account of a matter of fact. I use that particular expression because I thought it right, before I decided the case, to read over this fantastical will; and I observe that the testator says that his will shall take effect whatever the law may be. That may be foolish enough; but you cannot assume anything so grossly absurd as that he meant that the bequest should take effect, if, in point of fact, it could not. And, as it has failed in point of fact, my opinion is that the case must be considered as if it had not been made at all, and that, therefore, the decree must be as I have stated.

However, my opinion is that LORD LYNDHURST's decree has concluded the point, and it is not for me, sitting in this inferior jurisdiction, to entertain the question whether the bequest is good or bad. I declare that, it appearing, by the Master's report, that the Mount cannot be purchased, the bequest in the eighth clause totally fails and the clear residue of the testator's estate, after payment of his funeral expenses, debts and legacies and the costs of the suit, ought to be paid to the Governor-General of India, for the charitable purposes expressed in the ninth clause.

Chattel—Ownership—Rights of finder—Chattels found on private premises—Right of finder to chattels against all persons except real owner.

In October, 1847, the plaintiff, a traveller, visited the defendant's shop on business, and as he was leaving he noticed a parcel on the floor inside the shop which he picked up and showed to a shopman. On its being opened it was found to contain banknotes. The plaintiff informed the defendant and requested him to keep the notes until the owner appeared to claim them. The defendant advertised the discovery of the notes in a newspaper. Three years having elapsed and no owner having appeared to claim them, the plaintiff applied to the defendant for the return of the notes, offering to pay the expense of the advertising and to indemnify him in case the real owner should afterwards appear, but the defendant refused to deliver the notes to the plaintiff. In an action in the county court for their recovery the judge found as a fact that the plaintiff, when he handed over the notes to the defendant, did not intend to give up any title to them that he might possess.

Held: the fact that the plaintiff found the notes inside the defendant's shop did not take the case out of the general rule of law that the finder of a lost article is entitled to it as against all persons except the real owner; by handing the notes to the defendant the plaintiff had not divested himself of any title to them which he might have had; the steps taken by the defendant to find the real owner were taken by him as agent of the plaintiff; and, as the real owner could not be found, the plaintiff's title was paramount.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Westminster County Court in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant the value of several banknotes, which he had found on the floor of the defendant's shop.

In October, 1847, the plaintiff, a traveller for a firm with which the defendant, a shopkeeper, had dealings, went into the defendant's shop on business; and, as he was leaving, picked up from the floor a parcel containing banknotes to the amount of £65. He immediately showed it to the shopman; and thereupon the defendant was called in to the shop, and requested by the plaintiff to keep the notes, until the owner appeared to claim them. The defendant did so, and advertised the notes in a newspaper; but no owner claimed them. After three years had elapsed, the plaintiff applied to the defendant to return the notes, offering to pay the expenses of advertising, and to indemnify him in case the real owner should afterwards appear; but the defendant refused to do so, and consequently the present action was brought. The judge decided in favour of the title of the defendant, but found as a fact that the plaintiff, when he handed the notes over to the defendant, did not intend to divest himself of any title which he might have to them.

Gray (with him Heath) for the plaintiff.

Nov. 26, 1851. PATTESON, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—
The notes which are the subject of this action were dropped by mere accident in the defendant's shop by the owner of them. The facts do not warrant the supposition that they had been deposited there intentionally, nor has the case been put at all upon that ground. The plaintiff found them on the floor, they being manifestly lost by someone. The general right of the finder to any article which has been lost as against all the world except the true owner, was established in Armory v. Delamirie (1), which has never been disputed. This right would clearly have accrued to the plaintiff had the notes been picked up by him outside the shop of the defendant; and if he once had the right, the case finds that he did not intend by delivering the notes to the defendant, to waive the title (if any) which he had to them, but they were handed to the defendant merely for the purpose of delivering them to the owner, should he appear. B C

Nothing that was done afterwards has altered the state of things; the advertisements inserted in the newspapers referring to the defendant had the same object: the plaintiff has tendered the expense of these advertisements to the defendant, and offered him an indemnity against any claim to be made by the real owner, and has demanded the notes. The case, therefore, resolves itself to the single point on which it appears that the judge decided it, namely, whether the circumstance of the notes being found in the defendant's shop gives him, the defendant, the right to have them, as against the plaintiff who found them. There is no authority in our law to be found directly in point. Perhaps the nearest case is that of Merry v. Green (2), but it differs in many respects from the present. We were referred, in the course of the argument, to the work of VON SAVIGNY ON POSSESSION edited by PERRY, C.J.; but even this work, full as it is of subtle distinctions and nice reasonings, does not afford a solution of the present question. D E

It was well asked on the argument, if the defendant has the right, when did it accrue to him? If at all, it must have been antecedent to the finding by the plaintiff, for that finding could not give the defendant any right. If the notes had been accidentally kicked out of the shop, and there found by some one passing by, could it be contended that the defendant was entitled to them from the mere fact of their being originally dropped in his shop? If the discovery had never been communicated to the defendant, could the real owner have had any cause of action against him because they were found in his house? Certainly not. The notes never were in the custody of the defendant, nor within the protection of his house, before they were found, as they would have been had they been intentionally deposited there. The defendant has come under no responsibility, except from the communication made to him by the plaintiff, the finder, and the steps taken by way of advertisement. These steps were really taken by the defendant as the agent of the plaintiff, and he has been offered an indemnity, the sufficiency of which is not disputed. F G

We find, therefore, no circumstances to take this case out of the general rule of law that the finder of a lost article is entitled to it as against all persons, except the real owner; and we think that that rule must prevail, and that the judge was mistaken in holding that the place in which they were found makes any legal difference. Our judgment is, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to these notes as against the defendant; that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and judgment given for the plaintiff for £50; the plaintiff to have the costs of appeal. H I

A Scottish steamer, having run down an English barque lying in the Humber, kept out of the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty. The owners of the steamer were then sued in Scotland and the steamer was arrested there, but she was released on bail, and then sold without notice of the unsatisfied claim. The Scottish suit still pending, she re-appeared in English waters and was arrested under an Admiralty warrant, an action for damage being entered in the Admiralty Court by the owners of the barque. The cause of action was the same, and instructions were sent to abandon the Scottish suit. The owner of the steamer appeared under protest to the Admiralty action, pleading lis alibi pendens and purchase without notice.

Held: (i) the plea of lis alibi pendens was bad, as the suit in Scotland was substantially a proceeding in personam, while the present action was in rem; (ii) the ship was liable, into whose hands soever she had come.

Appeal by the defendant, Harmer, from the High Court of Admiralty of England.

The Bold Buccleugh was a steamer belonging to the Edinburgh and Dundee Steam-packet Co., the partners of which company all resided in Scotland, and trading between the ports of Leith, Scotland, and Kingston-upon-Hull, Yorkshire. On the night of Dec. 14, 1848, as the barque William was lying at anchor in the river Humber, it was run down and totally destroyed by the Bold Buccleugh, then on her voyage to Leith. On Dec. 19 an action for damage was entered in the English Court of Admiralty on behalf of the owners of the William, who resided in England; and a warrant was forwarded to Hull to arrest the steamer, but she had left before the arrival of the warrant, which, consequently, could not be executed. The owners of the Bold Buccleugh were applied to, to give bail to this action entered in the Admiralty Court, but declined to do so. Thereafter the Bold Buccleugh kept out of the way, and ceased to ply to Hull, or to come within the jurisdiction of the court. The owners of the William being thus unable to obtain redress, resorted to the Court of Session, which is the Court of Admiralty in Scotland, and on Jan. 30, 1849, commenced a suit against the owners of the steamer, and she was forthwith arrested in Leith harbour, but on bail being given she was released.

While the Scottish suit was pending, the owners of the Bold Buccleugh, on June 26, 1849, by a bill of sale, absolutely sold her to Harmer, the appellant, for £4,800 and did not apprise him that there were any unsatisfied claims arising out of damage to the William. At the end of August the Bold Buccleugh reappeared on her old track, between Leith and Hull, whereupon the owners of the William, without discontinuing the Scottish suit, entered on August 27, 1849, an action in the English Admiralty Court in the sum of £2,600, and on her coming to Hull she was arrested by virtue of a fresh warrant under seal of that court. The appellant, her owner, then entered appearance under protest, and gave bail to the action. On the act of protest being brought in, affidavits were produced by the appellant that he had no notice of the unsatisfied claim when he purchased the steamer. The respondents, the owners of the William also produced an affidavit of their attorney in Scotland, which showed that, subsequent to the present action being brought, they had offered to abandon the Scottish suit, and that, although this was opposed by the appellant, who applied to be made a party, yet in respect of this abandonment the suit was at length finally dismissed by the Court of Session, on Dec. 6, 1849. The contents of the protest now insisted in before the judge of the Admiralty were—(i) That at the time of the arrest there was lis alibi pendens. (ii) The steamer had been sold prior to the arrest, and it was unjust that the innocent purchaser should suffer. Both points of the protest were overruled, and the appellant and his bail were condemned in costs. The appellant appealed.

Anderson, Q.C., and Dr. Haggard for the appellant.

Addams for the respondents.

A April 24, 1852. JERVIS, C.J.—There were two questions in this case. First, the effect of the pendency of another proceeding in Scotland for the same cause; secondly, the liability of the vessel by a proceeding in rem after a bona fide sale without notice. It is manifest that these two defences are of a totally different nature, the first being a declinatory plea, properly the subject of a protest; and the second an absolute bar. Generally it is inconvenient to depart from the settled rules of procedure, and to raise such questions differing in degree by the same defence; but as the court below did not object to this course, we merely notice it to observe, that we do not approve of such a proceeding, and pass on to deliver our opinions on the two points raised.

C On the first point, we have not, from the commencement of the discussion, entertained any doubt, but we desired the second question to be re-argued, because it was of great general importance, and because we were unable to find any authorities bearing directly upon it, and some of the cases to which we were referred were apparently conflicting with each other. The course which was taken on the second argument makes it convenient to dispose of the second question in the first instance.

D It is admitted that the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction in a case of collision by a proceeding in rem against the ship itself; but it is said that the arrest of the vessel is only a means of compelling the appearance of the owners, that the damage confers no lien on the ship, and that the owners having appeared, the question is to be determined according to the interests of the party litigant, without reference to the original liability of the vessel causing the wrong. For these propositions, dicta have been referred to which are entitled to great respect, but which, on consideration, will be found not to support the propositions for which they were cited.

E In The Johann Friederich (1), Dr. LUSHINGTON is reported to have said, that proceedings in rem in the Court of Admiralty were analogous to those by foreign attachment in the courts of the city of London. For the purpose for which that allusion was made, viz., the liability of the property of foreigners to be arrested by process out of the Court of Admiralty and the courts of the city of London, the two proceedings may be analogous, but in other respects they are altogether different.

F The foreign attachment is founded on a plaint against the principal debtor, and must be returned nihil before any step can be taken against the garnishee; the proceeding in rem, whether for wages, salvage, collision, or on bottomry, goes against the ship in the first instance. In the former case the proceedings are in personam, in the latter they are in rem. The attachment, like a common law distringas, is merely for the purpose of compelling an appearance, and if the defendant appears within a year and a day, even after judgment and execution against the garnishee, and puts in bail, the attachment is abandoned.

G If the owners do not appear to the warrant arresting the ship, the proceedings go on without reference to their default, and the decree is confined exclusively to the vessel. Many other distinctions will be found on reference to the notes to Turbill's Case (2), (1 Wms. Saund. at p. 67, n. 1). It is not correct, therefore, to say that the proceeding in rem is in all respects analogous to the proceeding by foreign attachment, and that the former is merely to compel an appearance because the latter is undoubtedly for that purpose only.

H In all proceedings in rem, whatever be the foundation of the jurisdiction, the warrant is the same, and the proceedings are conducted in the same form, and there is no reason for saying that a different rule is to prevail where the foundation of the jurisdiction is a collision, from that which is admitted to be the practice when the suit is instituted for salvage, or the recovery of wages against the ship.

I It is further said, that the damage confers no lien on the ship, and a dictum of Dr. LUSHINGTON in The Volant (3) (1 Wm. Rob. at p. 387) is cited as an authority for this proposition. By reference to a contemporaneous report of the same case (1 Notes of Cases, at p. 508), it seems doubtful, whether the judge did use the expression attributed to him by Dr. W. ROBINSON. If he did, the expression is certainly inaccurate, and being a dictum merely, not necessary for the decision of that case, cannot be taken as a binding authority. A maritime lien does not include or require possession. The word is used in maritime law not in the strict legal sense in which we understand it in courts of common law, in which case there could be no lien where there was no possession, actual or constructive, but to express, as if by analogy, the nature of claims which neither pre-suppose nor originate in possession. This was well understood in the civil law, by which there might be a pledge with possession, and a hypothecation without possession, and by which in either case the right travelled with the thing into whosoever possession it came. A

Having its origin in this rule of the civil law, a maritime lien is well defined by LORD TENTERDEN to mean a claim or privilege on a thing to be carried into effect by legal process, and STORY, J. (1 Sumner 78) explains that process to be a proceeding in rem, and adds that wherever a lien or claim is given on the thing, then the Admiralty enforces it by a proceeding in rem, and indeed is the only court competent to enforce it. A maritime lien is the foundation of the proceeding in rem, a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches, and whilst it must be admitted that where such a lien exists a proceeding in rem may be had, it will be found to be equally true that in all cases where a proceeding in rem is the proper course there a maritime lien exists, which gives a privilege or claim on the thing to be carried into effect by legal process. This claim or thing travels with the thing into whosoever possession it may come. It is inchoate from the moment the claim or privilege attaches, and when carried into effect by legal process by a proceeding in rem, relates back to the period when it first attached. B C D

This simple rule, which, in our opinion, must govern this case, and which is deduced from the civil law, cannot be better illustrated than by reference to the circumstances of The Aline (4), referred to in the argument, and decided in conformity with this rule, though apparently on other grounds. In that case there was a bottomry bond before and after the collision, and the court held that the claimant for damage in a proceeding in rem must be preferred to the first bondholder, but was not entitled against the second bondholder to the increased value of the vessel, by reason of repairs effected at his cost. The interest of the first bondholder taking effect from the period when his lien attached, he was, so to speak, a part owner in interest at the date of the collision, and the ship in which he and others were interested was liable to its value at that date for the injury done with reference to his claim. So by the collision the interest of the claimant attached, and dating from that event, the ship in which he was interested having been repaired, was put in bottomry by the master, acting for all parties, and he would be bound by that transaction. This rule, which is simple and intelligible, is, in our opinion, applicable to all cases. It is not necessary to say that the lien is indelible, and may not be lost by negligence or delay, where the rights of third parties may be thereby compromised, but where reasonable diligence is used, and the proceedings are had in good faith, the lien may be enforced into whosoever possession the thing may come. E F G

The remaining point may be disposed of in a few words. The pleadings show that the proceedings in Scotland were commenced by process against the person of the defendant and that the seizure of the vessel was collateral to that proceeding for the mere purpose of securing the debt. We have already explained that, in our judgment, a proceeding in rem differs from this, the one being in personam, the other in rem; and it follows that the two suits, being in their nature different, the pendency of the one cannot be pleaded in suspension of the other. For these reasons, we are of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed with costs. H I

*Bill of Sale—Rights of grantee—Goods in possession of grantor until default—
No demand for payment by grantee—Goods seized in execution for another creditor.*

The payment of a sum owing to the plaintiffs was secured by a bill of sale on the goods of the debtor which contained covenants under which the plaintiffs were entitled to possession of the goods if the debtor failed to comply with a demand for payment. Until a default was made in payment the debtor was entitled to possession of the goods. Before any demand for repayment was made by the plaintiffs, the goods were seized by the sheriff under a writ of fieri facias and sold to satisfy the claim of another creditor. On a claim by the plaintiffs in trover to recover the value of the goods,

Held: the plaintiffs, not having made any demand for payment, had no immediate right to possession of the goods, and could not, therefore, maintain an action in trover against the Sheriff.

Action to recover the value of goods seized in execution on a writ of fieri facias; the action contained two counts, that in trover being the count on which this case is reported.

H

By an order of COLTMAN, J., a Case containing the following facts was stated for the opinion of the court: The plaintiffs, William Bradley and John Newton Mappin, were possessed, for the residue of an unexpired term, of an inn at Rotherham, in Yorkshire, called the College Inn, together with the furniture and effects thereof. In August, 1842, the plaintiffs let the inn and sold the furniture and effects to one Boulton, and on Aug. 10, 1842, he was let into possession.

I

On Aug. 22, 1842, a bill of sale under seal was executed by Boulton and the plaintiffs by which, after reciting that Boulton was indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £196 6s. 5d., Boulton assigned to them absolutely his furniture, fixtures and effects, crops and tillages, subject to redemption on payment by Boulton to the plaintiffs of the £196 6s. 5d. and interest, on demand. In default of payment the following powers were given to the plaintiffs:

"If default be made in payment of the said sum of £196 6s. 5d. and interest, in manner aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the said William Bradley and John Newton Mappin, their executors, administrators, and assigns, immediately thereupon or at any time thereafter, to seize and take possession of all and singular the said furniture, goods, chattels, stock, crops, tillages, and premises, and hold and enjoy the same to and for their own absolute use and benefit, for ever discharged from the aforesaid proviso for redemption thereof and all equity thereupon, without any hindrance from or by the said John Boulton, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or any other person whomsoever, and that freed and discharged from all former and other charges, liens, and encumbrances whatsoever."

The indenture contained also a covenant for further assurance and the following proviso:

"Provided always, and it is hereby declared and agreed, that until default shall be made in payment of the said principal sum of £196 6s. 5d. and interest, contrary to the covenant hereinbefore contained for payment thereof, it shall be lawful for the said John Boulton, his executors and administrators, to hold, make use of, possess, and enjoy all and singular the said furniture, goods, chattels, stock, crops, tillages, and premises, without any hindrance or denial from or by the said William Bradley and John Newton Mappin, their executors, administrators, or assigns."

Boulton, before he entered upon the College Inn or executed the bill of sale, was indebted to one Robert Taylor in the sum of £90 3s. 2d.; for which, on Aug. 11, 1842, he bona fide gave a warrant of attorney to Taylor, payable by instalments. Judgment was signed thereon on May 9, 1843, and a writ of fieri facias, under which writ the defendant, as sheriff, seized in execution all the goods and chattels at the College Inn comprised in the bill of sale given by Boulton to the plaintiffs. At the time of the seizure the said goods and chattels were and continued in the possession and under the control of Boulton, under and subject to the claims and rights of the plaintiffs under the said bill of sale, and the debt of £196 6s. 5d. remaining unpaid.

The plaintiffs, on May 15, 1843, gave Taylor and the defendant notice that the goods seized were the property of the plaintiffs. The goods were sold, however, and the proceeds received by the defendant. This action was brought for their recovery.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, in the above circumstances, the plaintiffs, as against the said Robert Taylor, were entitled to the said goods and chattels taken in execution by the defendant.

Serjeant Channell (Overend with him) for the defendant.

TINDAL, C.J.—Ever since Gordon v. Harper (1), it has been held that the plaintiff must have the right of possession, as well as the right of property, to maintain the action of trover. That case has been followed by several others, and I cannot distinguish it from this, except that there the right of possession was parted with for a certain time; here it was for an uncertain time. The right of the plaintiffs to the possession is only if default be made in payment of the debt on demand; but no demand appears to have been made, and, therefore, they were not in a situation to have the possession of the furniture at the time of the conversion, and consequently cannot recover them in trover.

COLTMAN, J.—Cooper v. Willomatt (2) arose in circumstances somewhat analogous to the present case. There goods were demised to a party who was to deliver them up to the plaintiff on demand, and the party had himself wrongfully disposed of the property by selling it out and out. We held that the plaintiff might maintain trover without having made a demand, but it was expressly on the ground that the bailee had himself determined the bailment. Main's Case (3), though not there cited, would have been an authority which would have expressly distinguished that case from Gordon v. Harper (1). Here, as my Lord in the course of the argument

A has pointed out, the plaintiff's right to the possession on demand was subject to the option of the other party of paying instead the mortgage-money.

MAULE, J.—The present case cannot be distinguished from Gordon v. Harper (1), which has been always acted on, and cannot be overruled by us.

B CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The bill of sale did not give the plaintiffs a present right of possession to the goods, and this has not been altered by a sale by the sheriff. In order to entitle the plaintiffs to recover, there must have been a demand and a failure of payment; but here neither has happened.

Judgment for defendant.

Contract—Breach—Damages—Remoteness of damage—Damages not in contemplation of defendant at date of contract—Special circumstances not communicated to defendant.

F

The defendants, common carriers, agreed with the plaintiffs to carry a quantity of cotton to the plaintiffs' mill. The fact that the mill would be at a standstill if the cotton were not delivered immediately was not communicated to the defendants, and owing to delay in the delivery of the cotton the mill was kept idle for two-and-a-half days. In an action for damages the plaintiffs claimed the amount of wages paid to their workmen and their loss of profit during the time that the mill was idle.

Held: the damages claimed did not arise naturally from the defendants' breach of contract and could not reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, and, therefore, they were not recoverable.

Appeal by the defendants, the Lancashire and Yorkshire Rail. Co. by Case Stated from an order of the Oldham County Court, in an action in which the plaintiffs claimed from the defendants £20 10s. damages for breach of contract. The particulars annexed to the summons stated that the defendants, as common carriers, agreed with the plaintiffs for reward to carry on their railway, and to deliver to the plaintiffs, fifteen bales of cotton, yet they broke their agreement by not carrying and delivering them within a reasonable time; but on the contrary neglected and refused to carry and deliver the same for seven days, whereby the plaintiffs were injured in their trade and business as cotton spinners, and they were prevented from working their mill and machinery during each of the said days, and incurred expenses in compensating their workmen for loss of time, and lost great profits. B C

A short time before these proceedings the plaintiffs rented a mill at Bottom-o'-the-Moor, near Oldham, which they intended to work, in addition to another mill which they had previously worked. At the beginning of the week commencing Jan. 22, 1860, the mill was ready, and the plaintiffs had engaged a number of hands for it. On Tuesday, Jan. 24, Thomas Gee, the first plaintiff, went to Liverpool and purchased a quantity of cotton for the mill. Ten bales of cotton, part of the purchase, were, on Thursday, Jan. 26, at about 11 a.m., delivered to the defendants at the station at Liverpool, to be carried to Oldham to the plaintiffs' mill there. It was proved that the plaintiffs had been constantly in the habit of purchasing cotton at Liverpool for their old mill and having the same carried by the defendants; and that, on all former occasions, the cotton delivered to the defendants at Liverpool on the afternoon of one day had been delivered at the plaintiffs' mill at Oldham by 9 a.m. on the following morning at latest. D E

The cotton in question was not delivered at the plaintiffs' mill until Monday, Jan. 30 at 11.30 a.m.; and in consequence of the delay the plaintiffs' mill was prevented from being worked on Friday, Jan. 27. Saturday, 28 and half of Monday, 30. F

Plaintiffs' work people were kept idle for the time, to whom they had to pay wages	7	0	0	G
Rent of the mill was £410 p.a., a proportion of which for the time in question was	3	10	0
Plaintiffs had £8,000 capital invested in the business, interest on which for the time in question was	2	10	0
Profits that they would have made	7	10	0	H

Thomas Gee stated in evidence that he made numerous inquiries of the defendants' manager about the delivery of the cotton on Jan. 25, 26, 27 and 28 and on each occasion he told him that the mill was at a standstill solely on account of the non-delivery of the cotton and also that the plaintiffs would look to the defendants for compensation for the loss occasioned. In cross-examination Gee stated that the new mill had not started working when the delay in delivery occurred but that it was in every respect ready to start on receipt of the cotton; that the fact that the mill would be at a standstill if the cotton was not delivered immediately was not stated to the defendants or their agent at Liverpool by the person who delivered the cotton there at the time of such delivery, and that the cotton was delivered to be carried in the ordinary way, without any special terms or contract as to delivery thereof at the plaintiffs' mill at Oldham; and that the company had a daily delivery of goods at Oldham. I

A No witnesses were called by the defendants, but it was objected by their advocate that Hadley v. Baxendale (1) showed that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the damages they sought to recover. The judge in directing the jury said that the question of neglect was not disputed by the defendants, because the plaintiffs established it in their evidence, and it was not contradicted that he thought it was too nice to seek as damages the interest on capital, and the proportion of rent, and he should tell the jury not to consider these two items in estimating the damage to which the plaintiffs were entitled; but when under circumstances such as existed in the present case, by neglect of the carrier, a man had no material to carry on his business, he had a right, in his opinion, to charge as legal damage such loss as naturally and immediately arose from the stoppage of his mill. That the question they would have to decide was what has been the actual loss and actual detriment that the plaintiffs had suffered by the non-arrival in due course of the cotton. The plaintiffs were entitled to the money they had actually paid as wages, £7. The rent and the interest on capital were matters too remote for a calculation of damage, but the profit the plaintiffs would have made was a fair subject of calculation, and Gee put it at £7 10s. No doubt, however, Gee had calculated it at the highest amount. The jury would, therefore, give such damages as they should think proper over £7, such amount, in fact, as in their opinion would be the actual loss and detriment that the plaintiffs had suffered by the non-arrival of the cotton in due course.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs with £15 damages. The defendants, being dissatisfied with the judge's direction relating to damages appealed.

E Gray for the defendants.
Wheeler for the plaintiffs.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This is a Case Stated by way of appeal from a county court, on the ground that the county court judge misdirected the jury before whom the cause was tried; and that there was an error in the direction which he gave to the jury in respect of two of the items claimed by the plaintiffs' particulars of damage. I am of opinion that there was a misdirection in point of law, and that the cause should be sent down again for another trial.

G The summing-up of the judge was not susceptible of two interpretations. He had told the jury that the plaintiffs were legally entitled to damages for the loss actually occasioned by the stoppage of the mill, and that having estimated the loss of profit, they ought to give it. Was the ruling in accordance with the law as laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (1)? The damage did not accrue from the non-arrival of the cotton alone; but was the consequence of the non-arrival coupled with the fact that the plaintiffs had no cotton to resort to? If it could have been proved that every carrier must know that when cotton did not arrive, the particular mill to which it was consigned would be kept from work, and that when cotton is delivered to a railway company to carry it is also notice that the mill to which it is to be delivered is stopped, and the men employed there at a standstill, waiting for that particular cotton, then such a ruling might probably be correct. The railway company would then have the option of saying, "We will not take the responsibility upon ourselves unless you agree to pay a very much higher price for it accordingly, and so insure the extra risk."

I No doubt the company would be bound to carry goods at a reasonable rate, with ordinary care; but this is an extra risk sought to be imposed on them without any special contract or any proof or evidence of the course of trade of these mills, or that the railway company knew anything about it, or (if there be any such limited working of the mills) that only one quantity of goods is consigned at a time, that the mills and men are stopped till another is supplied, which must be delivered in a particular time or the men's wages go on without work, the mills stopped, and the profits lost. The judgment in Hadley v. Baxendale (1) is correct, but that was not followed by the judge on this occasion; the plaintiffs' loss was occasioned partly from the delay in the delivery by the defendants, but also partly from the plaintiffs A having no other cotton to go on with, which was not the fault of the defendants.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. The damages will very probably be the same on the next occasion as they were at the first trial. I at first doubted whether the judge had not laid down correctly the case to the jury, but, as it is reported to us by the case, I think he has not. Hadley v. Baxendale (1) is correct. B
It is there said :

“Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it.” C

If the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract which they would reason- D ably contemplate would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated.
On the other hand, if these special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he, at the most, could only be supposed to have had in his contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally, and in the great multitude of cases not affected by any special circumstances, from such a breach of contract. For, had the special circumstances been known, the parties might have specially provided for the breach of contract by special terms as to the damages in that case, and of this advantage it would be very unjust to deprive them. These are the principles by which the jury ought to be guided in estimating the damages arising out of breach of contract. E

If the defendants break their contract to carry the plaintiffs' goods, then the first thing is to find out the loss sustained in consequence, and next to abide by the law as laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (1). Suppose the cotton-spinners have no goods for consumption on their premises at the time when others are bought and sent, the plaintiffs are not to recover more damages from the defendants in consequence of it. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that the plaintiffs are to recover these two items objected to, although as a matter of fact the circumstances may be stated to the jury. Counsel for the plaintiffs says the whole summing-up should be looked at together, and no doubt that is so, and as a proposition of fact, if stated or left in that way, it would be right; but here it is not susceptible of that interpretation. [His LORDSHIP referred to the Case Stated, and the ruling of the county court judge.] I cannot say that that is correct in point of law; therefore, the summing-up was erroneous and open to the vice which has been pointed out. F
G
H

CHANNELL, B.—I am also of opinion that the defendants are entitled to the judgment of the court, and that the rule as laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (1) is correct. We are not to take, it is true, one part of the summing-up alone, but to see if, on looking at all, we can construe the whole as a correct summing-up in point of law; but doing so, and looking at the whole of it, it seems to me from the case, that the judge directs the jury that the plaintiffs were entitled to the money I they had actually paid as wages of £7, and the profit the plaintiffs would have made if the cotton had arrived in due course, and I cannot but think a new trial ought to be granted for this misdirection.

WILDE, B.—I am of the same opinion. There are four items in the plaintiffs' particulars of claim, two of which are objected to with reference to the direction given to the jury on them, one of £7 for workmen's wages when the plaintiffs' mill is alleged to have been kept idle for the non-delivery of this cotton in due course,

A and the other of £7 10s. for the profit the plaintiffs would have made by working their mill for the time in question. I do not think the summing-up of the judge with reference to these two items is susceptible of the interpretation counsel for the plaintiffs has put on it. No doubt it was laid down from the case, as stated to us, that the plaintiffs were entitled to these as legal damage.

B The only question is whether that is correct according to Hadley v. Baxendale (1), where it was held that the damages which one party ought to receive in respect of a breach of contract by another should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered, either arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, as

C the probable result of the breach of it.

Here this is not the consequence arising naturally, or such as was supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties, but partly because the plaintiffs have no other cotton to go on with to keep their mill at work, and it was not solely the fault of the defendants. It was said there was a general rule that, in a feverish or excited state of the market, the cotton or millowners only bought their goods as

D it were from hand to mouth; that the defendants well knew it, and that the mill was stopped at this time when the goods were to have been sent off. I know no such general rule, nor was there any evidence of it in this case. Those matters indeed are not the legal measure of damage; nor is it the province of a judge to tell the jury what specifically they are to find as damage—there is no legal measure of damage at all. The facts are to be stated to the jury, and the damages are

E peculiarly for them to determine. The circumstances of this case will not support the ruling of the judge at the trial, and for these reasons I think it wrong, and that there should be a new trial.

Appeal allowed; order for a new trial.

MAY v. BURDETT

[COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH (Lord Denman, C.J., Patteson, Coleridge and Wightman, JJ.), January 13, 15, 26, 1846]

[Reported 9 Q.B. 101; 16 L.J.Q.B. 64; 7 L.T.O.S. 253;
10 Jur. 692; 115 E.R. 1213]

Animal—Ferae naturae—Injury to plaintiff—Ferocious nature known to keeper—No default on part of keeper—Liability of keeper.

The plaintiff was attacked by a monkey kept by the defendant, which the defendant knew was of a mischievous and ferocious nature, and accustomed to attack and bite mankind. In an action for damages for the injuries which the plaintiff sustained there was no averment of negligence or of default in the securing or taking care of the animal on the part of the defendant.

Held: a person who kept an animal accustomed to attack and bite mankind, with knowledge that it was so accustomed, was prima facie liable in an action on the case at the suit of any person who was attacked and injured by the animal without any allegation of negligence or default in the securing or taking care of it; the gist of the action was the keeping of the animal after knowledge of its mischievous propensities.

Per Curiam: (i) It would be no defence if the monkey had escaped, without default on the part of the defendant, and had committed the injuries while at large, because the monkey being ferae naturae, a person keeping such an animal must keep it secure at all events; (ii) it might, however, be a defence if the injury was solely occasioned by the wilfulness of the plaintiff after warning, but the court would express no opinion as to this.

D Rule Nisi to arrest judgment in an action by the plaintiff, Sophia May, the wife of Stephen May, for damages for injuries caused by a monkey kept by the defendant Burdett.

The declaration stated that defendant, before and at the time of the damage and injury hereinafter mentioned to Sophia, the wife of the plaintiff Stephen May, wrongfully and injuriously kept a monkey, he, the defendant, well knowing that the monkey was of a mischievous and ferocious nature and was used and accustomed to attack and bite mankind, and that it was dangerous and improper to allow the monkey to be at large and unconfined: which monkey, while the defendant kept the same as aforesaid, heretofore and before the commencement of this suit, to wit on Sept. 2, 1844, did attack, bite, wound, lacerate and injure the plaintiff's wife, whereby she became and was greatly terrified and alarmed, and became and was sick, sore, lame and disordered, and so remained and continued for a long time, to wit from the day and year last aforesaid to the time of the commencement of this suit; whereby, and in consequence of the alarm and fright occasioned by the monkey so attacking, biting, wounding, lacerating and injuring her as aforesaid, she has been greatly injured in her health. The defendant denied liability. At the trial, before WIGHTMAN, J., at the sittings in Middlesex after Hilary term, 1845, a verdict was found for the plaintiff with £50 damages. The defendant, in the ensuing term, obtained a rule to show cause why judgment should not be arrested.

G Watson and Couch showed cause against the rule.
Cockburn and Pickering supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

H June 2, 1846. LORD DENMAN, C.J., read the following judgment of the court.—This was a motion to arrest the judgment in an action on the case for keeping a monkey which the defendant knew to be accustomed to bite people, and which bit the female plaintiff. The declaration stated that the defendant wrongfully kept a monkey, well knowing that it was of a mischievous and ferocious nature and used and accustomed to attack and bite mankind, and that it was dangerous to allow it to be at large; and that the monkey, while the defendant kept the same as aforesaid, did attack, bite, and injure the female plaintiff, whereby she became injured in her health. It was objected, on the part of the defendant, that the declaration was bad for not alleging negligence or some default of the defendant in not properly or securely keeping the animal; and it was said that, consistently with this declaration, the monkey might have been kept with due and proper caution, and that the injury might have been entirely occasioned by the carelessness and want of caution of the plaintiff herself.

A great many cases and precedents were cited upon the argument; and the conclusion to be drawn from them appears to us to be that the declaration is good upon the face of it; and that whoever keeps an animal accustomed to attack and bite mankind, with knowledge that it is so accustomed, is prima facie liable in an action on the case at the suit of any person attacked and injured by the animal, without any averment of negligence or default in the securing or taking care of it. The gist of the action is the keeping the animal after knowledge of its mischievous propensities.

The precedents, both ancient and modern, with scarcely an exception, merely state the ferocity of the animal and the knowledge of the defendant, without any allegation of negligence or want of care. A great many were referred to upon the argument, commencing with the REGISTER and ending with Thomas v. Morgan (1), and all in the same form, or nearly so. In the REGISTER, 110, 111, two precedents of writs are given, one for keeping a dog accustomed to bite sheep, and the other for keeping a boar accustomed to attack and wound other animals. The cause of action, as stated in both these precedents, is the propensity of the animals, the knowledge of the defendant, and the injury to the plaintiff; but there is no allegation of negligence or want of care. In Mason v. Keeling (2), much relied upon on the part of the defendant, want of due care was alleged, but the scienter was omitted; and the question was, not whether the declaration would be good without the allegation of want of care, but whether it was good without the allegation of knowledge, which it was held that it was not.

No case was cited in which it had been decided that a declaration stating the ferocity of the animal and the knowledge of the defendant was bad for not averring negligence also; but various dicta in the books were cited to show that this is an action founded on negligence, and, therefore, not maintainable unless some negligence or want of care is alleged. In COMYNS'S DIGEST, tit. Action upon the case for Negligence (A 5), it is said that "an action upon the case lies for a neglect in taking care of his cattle, dog, etc."; and passages were cited from the older authorities, and also from some cases at nisi prius, in which expressions were used showing that, if persons suffered animals to go at large, knowing them to be disposed to do mischief, they were liable in case any mischief actually was done; and it was attempted to be inferred from this that the liability only attached in case they were suffered to go at large or to be otherwise ill secured.

But the conclusion to be drawn from an examination of all the authorities appears to us to be this: that a person keeping a mischievous animal with knowledge of its propensities is bound to keep it secure at his peril, and that, if it does mischief, negligence is presumed, without express averment. The precedents as well as the authorities fully warrant this conclusion. The negligence is in keeping such an animal after notice. Smith v. Pelah (3), and a passage in 1 HALE'S PLEAS OF THE CROWN, 430, put the liability on the true ground. It may be that, if the injury was solely occasioned by the wilfulness of the plaintiff after warning, that may be a ground of defence, by plea in confession and avoidance: but it is unnecessary to give any opinion as to this; for we think that the declaration is good upon the face of it, and shows a prima facie liability in the defendant.

It was said, indeed, further, on the part of the defendant, that, the monkey being an animal ferae naturae, he would not be answerable for injuries committed by it, if it escaped and went at large without any default on the part of the defendant, during the time it had so escaped and was at large, because at that time it would not be in his keeping nor under his control; but we cannot allow any weight to this objection: for, in the first place, there is no statement in the declaration that the monkey had escaped, and it is expressly averred that the injury occurred while the defendant kept it: we are besides of opinion, as already stated, that the defendant, if he would keep it, was bound to keep it secure at all events. The rule, therefore, will be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Will—Alteration—Time of making—Presumption—After execution of will—Rebuttal—Evidence—Declaration by testator—Production of draft will or instructions to solicitor.

C

There is a presumption that an alteration made in a will was made after the will was executed, but that presumption is rebuttable, the onus being cast on the person who seeks to derive an advantage from the alteration to adduce evidence from which it may be inferred that the alteration was made before the will was executed. That evidence may be of declarations made by the testator semble, before and nearly down to the date of the will) of his intention to provide by his will for the person relying on the alteration, or it may be provided by the production of a draft will corresponding with the will in its altered form, or written instructions to a solicitor to draw a will in the altered form, or by proof of verbal instructions to that effect. A declaration by the testator, made after the will was executed, that the alteration in the will had been made before the execution of the will would be inadmissible.

Whitaker v. Tatham (1831), 7 Bing. 628.

Rule Nisi to enter a verdict for the lessor of the plaintiff in an action for ejectment for cottages and a garden in the borough of Stafford.

At the trial, before LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., at the Stafford Summer Assizes in 1850, it appeared that the lessor of the plaintiff claimed as devisee of Francis Brookes. C Francis Brookes was the heir-at-law of his brother Colonel William Brookes, who died in 1834, seised in fee of the premises in question. The defendant Palmer claimed, in right of his wife Appollina, as devisee of William Brookes. The will under which he claimed was entirely in the handwriting of William Brookes, duly executed and attested, and date July 27, 1833. It appeared on the face of it that it had originally been drawn so as to devise the property in question to Francis Brookes in fee, and that, by interlineations in the handwriting of William Brookes, this devise was changed into a devise to Francis Brookes for life with remainder to the defendant, Appollina Biddulph. The question in the cause was whether the alterations were made before or after execution of the will. In the will, which was produced at the trial, the material clause stood as follows:

"I do give and bequeath to Francis Brookes, of Moss Pit Bank, in the county of Stafford, gentleman, all those six lots of land and houses which I purchased from Mr. John Allan Stokes, and situate in the Crabberly and Church Lanes during his natural life and at his decease the Churchyard Cottages to descend [his heirs and assigns for ever] I also give and to Mary Thornton and at her death to Ann Thornton her daughter—Noah's F Ark cottages and garden to Appollina Biddulph, daughter of Mary Ann Biddulph. I do bequeath to the said Francis Brookes the sum of £1,000 to be realized from my funds in the Bengal treasury" etc.

The words within brackets were cancelled with a pen, but so as to be still legible; the words printed in italics were interlineations. The Noah's Ark cottages and garden were the premises sought to be recovered in this action. Appollina Biddulph, the wife of one of the defendants, was a natural daughter of Francis Brookes. The testator had purchased these premises after the making of a prior will which he had revoked. By the will of July 27, 1833, he disposed of the whole of his real and personal property, without making any provision for Appollina Biddulph, except by the above mentioned limitation of the premises in question. The execution of the will was proved by two of the subscribing witnesses. The testator signed the will in their presence, and said it was his will; but they were not informed of the contents. Charles Dawson, one of the executors, swore that the testator killed himself on the morning of April 5, 1834 and that he (the witness), on the same day, went to the testator's house in Stafford, and received from Mary Thornton, who had been his housekeeper and mistress, the will of July 27, 1833, enclosed in an envelope with three seals upon it, then unbroken. It was folded like a letter, with an endorsement upon it in the testator's handwriting, and in the envelope was a letter from him addressed to the witness. Ann Lookesly, who had lived as servant with the testator, swore that two or three months before his death she saw him give the packet containing the will to Mary Thornton, saying: "Mary, take this and keep it; if it should be wanted and I am not in the way, you will have it in your possession."

- A The defendants' counsel contended that the presumption was that the alteration in the devise was made before the will was executed, but the Lord Chief Justice, on the authority of Cooper v. Bockett (1), held the contrary. The defendants' counsel then proposed to call witnesses to prove declarations of the testator, before the will was executed, that he intended to make provision by his will for Appollina Biddulph. This evidence was objected to, but the Lord Chief Justice received it,
- B subject to the opinion of the court upon its admissibility. Dr. Knight, a physician at Stafford, was then called, and stated, in his examination in chief, that he knew the testator well, and attended him professionally; that he was one of his executors; that he had heard him talk of a testamentary disposition; and that he had frequently heard the testator say that he would make provision for Appollina Biddulph, of whom he appeared to be very fond. In cross-examination, the witness said that in
- C the latter end of 1833 (but he was indistinct as to the time) he applied to the testator for a loan of money for his brother Francis, and the testator said, "I cannot assist my brother; I have provided for his natural daughter." Ann Lockesly was recalled, and stated that, many a time before the will was executed in July, she had heard the testator say that, die when he might, he would leave Appollina two or three houses, and that he would leave the Churchyard cottages to Mary Thornton
- D for her life, and afterwards to Ann Thornton, his own natural daughter, who was then at school. Charles Passman, an attorney at Stafford, swore that in 1830 he received instructions from the testator to prepare a will of which he produced a draft, containing a legacy of £500 to Appollina Biddulph, payable at the age of twenty-one, the interest to be applied to her maintenance. There was a will engrossed from this draft and executed. The testator was not then possessed of the
- E property in question. He went to India immediately after, and remained there two years. The defendants' counsel likewise contended that the appearance of the will afforded evidence that the alteration must have been made before it was executed; it was said that this was shown by the appearance of the folds, and of the ink upon it.

- The Lord Chief Justice permitted the jury to look at the will and left it to them
- F to say whether, from the evidence, they were satisfied that the alteration was made before the will was executed. The jury said they were so satisfied. The Lord Chief Justice then directed a verdict for the defendants, with leave to move to enter a verdict for the lessor of the plaintiff if the court should be of opinion that there was no admissible evidence to show that the alteration was made before the will was executed. In the ensuing term, accordingly, a rule nisi was obtained on
- G behalf of the plaintiff's lessor.

Keating and Whitmore showed cause against the rule.

Whateley and Phipson supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

- May 5, 1851. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., read the following judgment of the
- H court in which he stated the facts, and continued: After a long and very attentive consideration of the authorities and the arguments on both sides, we have come to the conclusion that the verdict for the defendant rests on legitimate evidence, and that it ought not to be disturbed.

- We agree that there is a presumption that the alteration was made after the will was executed, and, of course, this presumption must stand till some evidence
- I is adduced to rebut it. We are not absolutely bound by Cooper v. Bockett (1) as if that were a decision of the House of Lords, the tribunal to which an appeal lies in the last resort from the courts of common law, but we entirely approve of that decision. We are not called upon to give an opinion respecting an alteration apparent on the face of a deed or of a negotiable instrument. But, having regard to the Statute of Frauds, and to the Wills Act, 1837, respecting wills, we entertain no doubt that the onus is cast upon the party who seeks to derive an advantage from such an alteration in a will, to adduce some evidence from which the jury may infer that the alteration was made before the will was executed. Without this rule there would be a dangerous facility given to a testator to alter a holograph will after its execution; all wills might be altered by false declarations, and the presumption contended for by the defendant is inconsistent with s. 21 of the Wills Act, which enacts:

"No obliteration, interlineation, or other alteration made in any will after the execution thereof shall be valid . . . unless such alteration shall be executed in like manner as hereinbefore is required for the execution of the will . . ."

Then follows the exception that the signature and attestation in such a case may be in the margin instead of at the foot of the will.

We have to consider, therefore, whether in this case there was any admissible evidence to rebut the presumption. The evidence relied upon consisted of declarations by the testator, frequently made, before and nearly down to the time when the will was executed, that he intended to make provision by his will for Appollina Biddulph (the present defendant Mrs. Palmer), coupled with the fact that without this alteration the will, which disposes of the whole of his property, real and personal, makes no provision for her. Are these declarations admissible evidence to rebut the presumption? Or, in other words, ought the judge to have received this evidence, and to have told the jury that from this evidence they would be justified in inferring that the alteration had been made at the time when the will was executed, although they were not bound to do so?

It may be convenient, first, to consider the question, whether, if in a will which is not in the handwriting of the testator an alteration appears, evidence might be received of previous declarations by him that he intended to dispose of his property in the manner in which it is disposed of by the will in its altered form. If the draft of the will could be produced, corresponding with the will in its altered form, would it not be admissible evidence, and might not the jury infer from it that before the will was executed the draft and the will had been compared, and the mistake rectified? Would not written or verbal instructions from the testator to his solicitor to draw the will in the altered form be equally admissible? In what respect do such verbal instructions differ, for this purpose, from a contemporaneous declaration by the testator to another person that he had determined in his will to dispose of his property in the manner carried into effect by the will as altered? What distinction can be drawn between the draft of the will or the written instructions for the will, and the verbal declaration of the testator's intention, except as to the strength of the evidence which they respectively afford?

As to admissibility, they all seem to rest on the same principle, and, if the verbal declaration of intention must be rejected, so must the draft of the will with the initials of the testator affixed to it. It would not be very creditable to the law if such evidence were to be excluded, as a logical inference might be fairly drawn from it respecting the priority of two events, that is to say, the making of the alteration and the execution of the will, and I am not aware of any principle, rule of law, decided case or dictum against the admissibility of such evidence. I allow we cannot be guided alone by the consideration that both parties claim under the testator, for declarations of the testator after the time when a controverted will is supposed to have been executed would not be admissible to prove that it had been duly signed and attested as the law requires; and, for the same reason, a declaration by the testator, after the will was executed, that the alteration had been made previously would be inadmissible. But the previous declarations of the testator as to his testamentary intentions do not seem to be liable to the same objections. They demonstrate that the alteration is not an afterthought; they cannot have been uttered with any view of evading the law respecting the execution of wills; and they still leave upon the devisee the burden of proving by reasonable evidence that this law has been complied with.

There certainly is evidence which, in particular cases, would weigh with a reasonable man in forming a belief on a doubtful question, and which the law excludes because, if generally admitted it would more frequently mislead than guide to a

- A just conclusion. But this evidence is not of that nature, for, although it may vary very much with respect to the weight to be given to it, it seems liable to no greater objection than the declarations of the testator respecting his testamentary intentions where a will is impeached on the ground of incompetency or of fraud. If declarations of the testator are receivable to rebut the presumption respecting an alteration in a will in the handwriting of another person, is there to be a different rule
- B as to a holograph will? There being a greater facility in altering such a will after its execution, the declarations may be entitled to less weight, but surely, if they are admitted with respect to the alteration of one class of wills, they cannot be excluded with respect to the other.

- Although no decision can be quoted in which such evidence for rebutting this specific presumption has been admitted, no case has occurred in which it has been
- C rejected, and in cases closely analogous similar evidence has often been received. Declarations of the testator have been admitted to rebut the presumption that a legacy is satisfied by a provision in the lifetime of the testator, and to rebut the presumption as to an executor being entitled to the residue of the personal estate. Not only where the competency of the testator is in dispute, but in all cases where there is any imputation of fraud in the making of the will, the declarations of the
- D testator are admitted respecting his dislike or affection for his relations, or those who appear in the will to be the objects of his bounty, and respecting his intentions either to benefit them or to pass them by in the disposition of his property: Doe d. Allen v. Allen (2), and Doe d. Ellis v. Hardy (3).

- Bateman v. Pennington* (4), although not adverted to in the argument, appears entitled to great consideration. The executors of Richard Sparling Berry, the testator having died suddenly, propounded for probate in the Prerogative Court of
- E Canterbury two papers found in his escritoire. The first was a will written in ink, with the date, October 5, 1837, written in pencil in the third line, with the signature of the testator likewise written in pencil, and preceded by the following words also written in pencil: "In case of accident I sign this my will." This paper had a clause of attestation, but without the subscription of any witness. The other paper,
- F without date, in the form of a will, was subscribed by the testator in ink; this paper had a clause of attestation without the subscription of any witness. The deceased at the time of his death was seised of real estates and possessed of personal property of great value which were all disposed of by these testamentary papers. Prima facie, these papers were not entitled to probate, the presumption being that they were only deliberative, and SIR HERBERT JENNER rejected an allegation, in
- G support of them, which relied chiefly upon the declaration in pencil—"In case of accident I sign this my will." But upon appeal to the Judicial Committee this sentence was reversed, and, the cause being then retained, probate was granted, although the date and signature, being in pencil, were presumptively deliberative, and the circumstance of the attestation clauses being unwitnessed afforded a strong presumption against the will, the Judicial Committee being influenced by the
- H declaration of the deceased that he intended to die testate. Might not a similar declaration in writing by the deceased on another paper, or by word of mouth, have been admitted equally to rebut the presumption?

- Almost all the cases cited on the part of the plaintiff were merely instances of the rejection of declarations of the testator where the question was upon the construction of ambiguous language used by him in his will. But this is not a case of
- I patent ambiguity, or upon the meaning of words at all, the question being entirely one of fact upon the priority of two events, the making of the alteration and the execution of the will. It, therefore, much more nearly resembles the cases respecting the factum of the will, in which the declarations of the testator have often been admitted.

The plaintiff's counsel relied much upon Earl of Newburgh v. Countess Dowager of Newburgh (5), where, the testator having executed a will devising to his wife lands in the county of Sussex, it was proposed, with a view of making the will likewise carry to her lands in the county of Gloucester, to prove that the draft of the will, prepared by the solicitor and settled by the conveyancer, devised to the wife lands in the counties of Sussex and Gloucester, which the testator approved of and desired to be copied for his execution, and that the stationer who copied it inadvertently left out the words "and Gloucester," and changed the word "counties" into "county." LEACH, V.-C., and afterwards the House of Lords, according to the unanimous advice of all the judges, decided that the evidence was not admissible to enlarge the devise as it appeared on the face of the will. There can be no doubt as to the propriety of that decision, for the proposed addition would have been a new will, contrary to the Statute of Frauds. But in the present case the evidence admitted was to show that the devise under which the defendants claimed was part of the will when it was duly executed.

Miller v. Travers (6) is equally well decided, and equally inapplicable. There the testator devised all his freehold estates in the county of Limerick and city of Limerick, having no estates in the county of Limerick, and a very small estate in the city of Limerick, but large estates in the county of Clare, which he intended to pass by his will, but did not mention. The devisee proposed to show by parol evidence that the estates in the county of Clare were devised to him in the draft of the will; that the draft was sent to a conveyancer to make certain alterations, not affecting the estates in the county of Clare; that by mistake he erased the county of Clare; and that the testator, after keeping the will by him for some time, executed it without adverting to this alteration. LORD BROUGHAM, L.C., by the advice of TINDAL, C.J., and LORD LYNTHURST, C.B., most properly held that the proposed evidence was inadmissible.

The only other case cited worth mentioning was Doe d. Hiscocks v. Hiscocks (7). There a testator devised lands to his son John Hiscocks for life, and on his decease to the testator's grandson, John Hiscocks, eldest son of the said John Hiscocks, for life, and on his decease to the first son of the body of his said grandson John Hiscocks, in tail male, with remainder over. At the time of making the will the testator's son, John Hiscocks, had been twice married. By his first wife he had one son, Simon; by his second an eldest son John, and other younger children, sons and daughters. The question was whether this John or Simon should take, neither of them answering fully the description given in the will. An ejectment being brought by Simon against John, it was proposed to offer in evidence the instructions given by the testator for his will, and also declarations made by him after its execution, to show that Simon was really the person in his contemplation as the object of his bounty at the time of making the will. This evidence was received, but the Court of Exchequer set aside a verdict founded upon it, being of opinion that for the purpose of removing this ambiguity the declarations of the testator ought not to be received as to what he intended to do in making his will. The object of the evidence was to assist in the construction of the will; and the real question was whether this should be considered as an instance of latent or patent ambiguity. The decision, therefore, whether right or wrong, is no authority in this case, where the question is totally different.

Upon the whole, there being no authority adverse to the defendants, analogous cases being in their favour, and the admission of the contested evidence appearing to us to be conducive to truth and justice, we are of opinion that it was rightly admitted. This is the only question which we have to determine. If the evidence was admissible, the weight to be given to it was a question for the jury.

But it may be proper to notice an argument much pressed at the Bar, that the declarations in favour of Appollina Biddulph are completely outweighed by the subsequent deliberate intention which the testator is supposed to have entertained to leave the premises in question in fee simple to his brother Francis. Although we should believe that the limitation of the premises, as first framed, was by deliberation and not by mistake, this does not show that the testator had ever for one moment changed his intention to make a provision by his will for Appollina Biddulph. Here, the alteration consists in turning a devise in fee of certain cottages to Francis Brookes into a limitation to him for life, with a remainder in fee to

- A Appollina Biddulph. If for a moment he intended she should take no interest in these cottages, we must recollect the declarations proved were not that he meant to leave these specific cottages to her, only that he meant to provide for her by his will; and it might easily have happened that before he had finished the writing of his will, or upon reading it over before it was executed, he recollected that he had made no provision for her, and that he then introduced the alteration, with a view
- B to keep the promise which he had often made. This seems much more probable than that he introduced the alteration after the will was executed, and before it was sealed up in the manner described, although it afterwards remained in his own custody. Not only may all be presumed to know the law upon the subject, but this testator himself had executed a prior will and was acquainted with the solemnities required for a valid devise of real estate. There appears to be no ground
- C for the conjecture that he might have altered the will after its execution, intending to have it re-attested and re-published; he had an ample opportunity to have done so if he had so intended. There seems every reason to believe that he sealed up the will immediately after its execution; and he certainly delivered it in a sealed packet a few weeks before his death to Mary Thornton, intending that it should remain in her custody till he should commit the fatal act which he then meditated.
- D We, therefore, think that the jury were fully justified in coming to the conclusion that the alteration was made before the will was executed. If the lessor of the plaintiff had proved that down to the execution of the will the testator did not know of the existence of Appollina Biddulph, or that he had expressed a purpose to exclude her from his will, an answer would have been given to the evidence offered by the defendants to rebut the presumption that the alteration was subse-
- E quent to the will, but the obliterated words showing that these premises had, at the first writing of this clause in the will, been limited in fee to Francis, afford a sufficient answer. It being quite certain that the testator intended that Appollina Biddulph should take the premises after the death of Francis, and the intention appearing to us to be testified according to the rules of law, we think that she ought to be allowed to remain in the possession of them; and that this rule to enter the
- F verdict for the lessor of the plaintiff ought to be discharged.

Rule discharged.

COLLEN v. WRIGHT AND OTHERS

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER (Sir Alexander Cockburn, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Williams and Willes, JJ., Bramwell, Watson and Channell, BB.), June 13, November 30, 1857]

[Reported 8 E. & B. 647; 27 L.J.Q.B. 215; 30 L.T.O.S. 209;
4 Jur.N.S. 357; 6 W.R. 123; 120 E.R. 241]

Agent—Misrepresentation—False representation of authority to act for principal—Liability of agent on implied warranty of authority—Relevance of honest belief by agent of possession of authority.

A person who professes to contract as agent for another impliedly undertakes with the person who enters into the contract on the faith of the agent's being duly authorised that the authority which he professes to have does in fact exist. Should the principal repudiate the contract the agent is liable to the person whom he has induced to enter into the contract for any damage which that person sustains through the assertion of authority being untrue. The fact that the agent honestly believed that he had the authority does not affect the question of his liability.

So held by POLLOCK, C.B., WILLIAMS and WILLES, JJ., and BRAMWELL, WATSON, and CHANNELL, BB., SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J., dissentiente.

G Appeal by the defendants against the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench on a Special Case, stated without pleadings under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.

H In 1853, the plaintiff was desirous of obtaining a lease of a farm, situated in Soham Fen, Cambridgeshire, belonging to William Dunn Gardiner, of Fordham Abbey, then about to become unoccupied. Robert Wright, deceased, was a land agent and valuer residing at Norwich, and up to within a short time before the plaintiff's application to him had the management of the property of W. D. Gardiner in and near Soham. The plaintiff, believing Wright still to have the management of the property and to be the general agent of Gardiner for the letting of the farm in Soham Fen, applied to Wright, as the supposed agent of Gardiner, for a lease thereof, and, after some negotiation between them, on April 21, 1853, an agreement in writing was prepared by Wright, and signed by him as the agent of Gardiner, and by the plaintiff, for a lease of the farm for a term of twelve years and a half from Lady Day, 1853. It was further agreed between the plaintiff and Wright that an agreement, stating in detail the terms referred to in the agreement, should be prepared without delay and be signed by the parties, and on April 22, 1853, the plaintiff, on the faith of the signing of the agreement by Wright, took possession of the farm. On May 31, 1853, an agreement in writing for a lease, stating the terms in detail, was signed by him and the plaintiff, as follows :

"Witness our hands this 31st day of May, 1853,
 R. WRIGHT,
 Agent to William Dunn Gardiner, Esq., lessor.

A

Before September, 1853, the plaintiff, relying upon the agreement and believing that Wright had authority to make and sign the same as the agent of Gardiner, and that a lease would be granted in accordance therewith, expended a considerable sum of money in the cultivation and improvement of the farm. On Nov. 16, 1853, he was informed that Gardiner refused to sign the lease on the ground that Wright was not authorised to let the farm on the terms set forth in the agreements. Shortly afterwards, the plaintiff, believing that Wright was duly authorised by Gardiner to sign the agreement as his agent, instituted a suit in the Court of Chancery against Gardiner for the specific performance of the contract, and for a decree directing Gardiner to execute and deliver to the plaintiff a lease according to the terms thereof. The suit came on to be heard on Feb. 29, 1856, before the Master of the Rolls, and judgment was pronounced therein that the plaintiff's bill should be dismissed without costs, on the ground that Wright had no authority from Gardiner to sign the said agreement as his agent, or on his behalf.

On April 7, 1855, after the suit had been commenced, and Gardiner had put in his answers to the plaintiff's bill, from which it appeared that he defended the suit upon the ground that Wright had no authority from him to sign the agreements as his agent, the plaintiff gave the defendant notice that he (the plaintiff) would proceed with the suit at the defendant's risk and expense, and that, in the event of the bill being dismissed on the ground of the defendant's not having had authority to sign the agreements, or to let the farm for the term of years therein mentioned, he (the plaintiff) would commence an action against the defendant to recover from him in respect of the damage sustained, or to be sustained, by him by reason of the defendant not having had authority to sign the agreements as agent for Gardiner, and also the costs and charges sustained and incurred by the plaintiff in prosecuting the suit. To that notice, on April 11, 1855, the defendant's solicitors replied:

"Sir,—We beg on the part of Mr. Wright, who has consulted us relative to the notice which you served upon him on Saturday last, to apprise you that Mr. Wright will resist any attempt on the part of Mr. Collen to saddle him with the risk and expense of the suit in Chancery mentioned in such notice. The suit was instituted by Mr. Collen at his own risk and expense, and for his own purposes, without Mr. Wright's privity or sanction, and it has been carried on by Mr. Collen's solicitor without Mr. Wright's consent or concurrence. We have also to inform you that Mr. Wright will defend all actions, if any, which Mr. Collen may bring against him for the purposes mentioned in the said notice.

H

We are, Sir, yours obediently,

ADAM and CLEMENT TAYLOR."

R. Wright died in January, 1856, leaving the defendants his executrix and executors, and on or about Mar. 22, 1856, the plaintiff received from Gardiner a notice to quit the farm on Sept. 29 next or at the expiration of the current year of his tenancy. The plaintiff quitted the farm in pursuance of that notice. When the action came to trial the Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that there was an implied contract by Wright that he had authority to let the farm, and that for the breach of it the defendants were liable to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the costs of the Chancery suit. The defendants appealed to the Court of Exchequer Chamber.

I

Nov. 30, 1857. WILLES, J., delivered the following judgment.—This was an action brought by John Collen against the personal representatives of Robert Wright, in which a Special Case was stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench. It appears that Robert Wright, the testator, professed to act as the agent of a Mr. Gardiner, and as such agent professed to enter into an agreement with the plaintiff for a lease from Gardiner to him of a farm. The plaintiff was not aware that Mr. Wright had no authority from Gardiner, and he proceeded to considerable expense in preparing the farm for cultivation. On Mr. Gardiner denying that Wright had his authority, he, still relying upon Wright's assertion that he had, filed a bill in Chancery, to procure specific performance of the agreement into which Wright had entered. The result of that was that it was established that Wright had not authority. The only fact which it is necessary further to mention is that Wright never withdrew the assertion that he had authority from Gardiner to let the farm, and upon a notice being given to him after the Chancery suit for specific performance had been commenced, namely, on April 7, 1853, giving him notice that he would be held responsible if the suit failed in consequence of want of authority—his answer was, not that he had no authority, and it was no use, therefore, going on with the suit in Chancery, but it was: "I will resist any claim you make upon me." Therefore, in the end, Mr. Wright did not withdraw the assertion that he had authority. The Court of Queen's Bench decided for the plaintiff on the ground that Wright warranted to Collen that he had authority, and did so by the representation of himself as being the agent of Gardiner; that the fact of his not having authority was a breach of an implied contract that he had, and that, accordingly, the plaintiff was entitled to recover against his executors. They further held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the costs of the Chancery suit among other expenses to which he had been put, and which he recovered in the present action; and the question is whether that decision was right?

It appears to me that the judgment of the Queen's Bench ought in all respects to be affirmed. I am of opinion that a person who induces another to contract with him as the agent of a third party by an unqualified assertion of his being authorised to act as such agent is answerable to the person who so contracts for any damages he sustains by means of the assertion of the authority being untrue. This is not the case of a bare mis-statement to a person not bound by any duty to give information. The fact that the professed agent honestly thinks that he had authority affects the moral character of his act, but his moral innocence, so far as the person he has induced to contract is concerned, in no way aids him or alleviates the inconvenience and damage which he sustains. If one of the two in such case is to suffer, it ought not to be the person who has been guilty of no error, but he who, by an untrue assertion believed and acted upon, as he intended it should be, and touching a subject within his peculiar knowledge and as to which he gave the other party no opportunity of judging for himself, has brought about the damage. The obligation arising in such a case is well expressed by saying that the person professing to contract as agent for another impliedly undertakes with the person who enters into such a contract upon the faith of his being duly authorised that the authority he professes to have does, in point of fact, exist. This was, in effect, the view taken by the Court of Queen's Bench, to which I adhere.

With respect to the amount of damages, I retain the opinion thrown out in the course of the argument that all the expenses sought to be recovered were occasioned by the assertion of authority made at the time of the contract being continued and persisted in by the defendant and bona fide acted on by the plaintiff. That assertion was never withdrawn, not even in the letter of April 11, 1855, in answer to the defendant's notice to the plaintiff long after the proceedings in Chancery had terminated. I am, therefore of opinion, that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench is right, and ought to be affirmed. I may mention that POLLOCK, C.B.,

WILLIAMS, J., BRAMWELL, WATSON, and CHANNELL, BB., concur in the judgment which I have pronounced. A

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J.—I regret most unfeignedly to find myself differing in this case from so many of my learned brethren, for whose opinions I entertain the profoundest respect and deference, and in whose views I should have every disposition to acquiesce if, after considering the subject with the most anxious desire to concur with them, I could persuade myself that, in giving judgment for the plaintiff, we were not going beyond what the law warrants. B

The proposition we are called upon to affirm is that by the law of England a party making a contract as agent in the name of a principal impliedly contracts with the other contracting party that he has authority from the alleged principal to make the contract, and that, if it turns out that he has not this authority, he is liable in an action on such implied contract. It appears to me that there is no sufficient authority to warrant this proposition, and that even assuming, for the purpose of the argument, that such a rule might be desirable, in establishing it we shall be creating a new law instead of expounding that which already exists. I believe I am fully justified in saying that this doctrine is altogether a novel one. I have looked carefully into the treatises and textbooks on the law of contract, and, so far as I have been able to discover, although the doctrine of implied contract has been fully discussed and the instances of implied contract as existing in the law of this country carefully enumerated, no mention is to be found of the implied contract contended for in this case. Nor is any trace of such an action to be found, so far as I am aware, in the printed books of precedent on the forms of action and of pleading. C

What is still more remarkable, in the learned and elaborate works which treat of the law relating to agency, and in which the liabilities of agents, or persons professing to act as such towards third parties, are fully considered, not even a hint is to be found of any implied contract on the part of the agent as to the existence of authority. In PROFESSOR STORY'S work on AGENCY, ch. 10, s. 264 and note 3, while it is laid down as clear that a person contracting as agent without authority will be liable to the party with whom the contract is made, yet when the question as to the mode in which that liability is to be enforced is considered, the alternative is put between a special action on the case, on the one hand, and an action on the contract against the professed agent as principal, on the other; but it does not appear to have occurred to that very learned and scientific jurist that either by the law of England or that of America an action could be maintained on an implied contract as to the existence of authority. In like manner, in the note to Thomson v. Davenport (1), in 2 SMITH'S LEADING CASES (4th Edn.), p. 298, where the principles as to liability, as collected from the cases on agency, are laid down, it is asserted that if a man state himself to be an agent, but has really no principal, he is, in law, himself the principal; but it is not suggested that he is liable ex contractu in any other form than as principal on the original contract. Nor is that silence to be wondered at, for on looking to the repeated decisions of our own and of the American courts, it will be found that, at the time these learned authors wrote, no such doctrine had ever been broached, but the remedy against a party contracting on behalf of another without authority was assumed to be either by an action on the case for the false representation or by an action against him as principal on the original contract. F
H

The doctrine that a person professing to act as agent without sufficient authority might be made responsible as principal, was only subverted at a comparatively recent period. In PALEY'S work on the LAW OF PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (3rd Edn.), ch. 6. s. 1, p. 386, it is laid down, and supported by authorities, that a party contracting as agent is responsible as principal where there is no responsible principal to resort to, and where he exceeds his authority, so that the principal is not bound. STORY, we have seen, holds the like language. In Jones v. Downman (2), which was an action ex contractu, the doctrine of STORY—that I

A "whenever any party undertakes to do any act as the agent of another, if he does not possess any authority from the principal, or if he exceeds the authority delegated to him, he will be personally responsible, therefore, to the person with whom he is dealing for or on account of his principal"

B —was adopted by the Court of Queen's Bench and said to be "supported by numerous authorities and founded on plain justice," and the defendant, who was there sued as principal, was held to be liable on the contract. It is true that that case was afterwards reversed on [appeal] in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, but solely on the ground that the absence of authority was not shown, and the court in other respects appears to have recognised the propriety of the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. In a note to Thomas v. Hewes (3), 2 Cr. & M. at p. 530, n., the same law is stated to have been laid down on different occasions by BAYLEY, B., and by LORD WENSLEYDALE, when a baron of the Exchequer, and in Smout v. Ilbery (4), where an action was brought against a married woman for goods purchased by her on her husband's account after his authority to pledge his credit had terminated by his death, of which fact she was ignorant, though the court held that the action could not be maintained under the circumstances, it was never doubted that the action was rightly brought in contract.

D Polhill v. Walter (5), in which it was held that a person accepting a bill drawn upon another, in the name of the drawee without authority, could not be sued upon the bill as acceptor, seems first to have given rise to a contrary impression, though that case turned mainly on the peculiar character of a bill of exchange as being incapable of being accepted by anyone but the drawee except for honour of the latter. But the more recent case of Jenkins v. Hutchinson (6), laid down the position broadly, that an action ex contractu could not be maintained against the professed agent as principal, and the same doctrine was fully confirmed and acted upon in the succeeding case of Lewis v. Nicholson (7). In the meantime the liability of a professed agent for the unwarranted assertion of authority in an action on the case underwent further consideration, and the doctrine of some writers than any misrepresentation whereby another was induced to do, or omit to do, an act from which injury resulted would render the party making it liable underwent material modification, the modern decisions having established that such misrepresentation will not afford a ground of action where made in good faith, and without knowledge that it was untrue.

G The effect of these doctrines being to leave a person who made a contract with another as agent without a remedy where the professed agent had acted under a mistaken impression as to his authority, it occurred to the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, who decided in Lewis v. Nicholson (7) that an action would not lie against the agent as principal, to suggest that, possibly, the agent might, under such circumstances, be held liable on an implied contract that he had authority to contract in the name of the principal, and the opinion thus incidentally thrown out in that case has been acted upon in this. It was, of course, impossible, so long as the doctrine prevailed that the professed agent could be sued as principal, that he could be held to be liable on this implied contract. It would have been obviously inconsistent to say that upon one and the same contract a man could at the same time be liable upon an express, and also upon an implied, promise. To my mind, it by no means follows that, because that which was believed to be the remedy in law turns out upon further consideration not to be so, we are, therefore, justified in resorting to the fiction of an implied contract hitherto unknown to our law. To me it seems a very strong argument against the existence of any such implied contract that, frequently as the question of the absence or excess of authority in supposed agents has been before our courts, and much as the question of the liabilities of agents has been discussed, no trace of the doctrine is to be found in our law books until within the last few years. I do not think we are justified in introducing such a remedy by the mere fiat of a judicial decree.

I do not stop to discuss the expediency or policy of the proposed rule. Otherwise, A
 I think it might be shown that there are two sides even to this part of the case.
 I doubt whether there is any sufficient ground why erroneous representation in the absence of falsehood or fraud should create a greater responsibility in the case of a contract than in the case of any other transaction, especially as the other contracting party might always protect himself by insisting on communicating with the alleged principal or by requiring a warranty of authority from the agent. But I by B no means desire to rest my opinion on this ground. My view is that the implied contract to be established by this case is a thing unknown to our law—that we are dealing, not with a mere mode whereby an acknowledged liability may be enforced, but, a supposed liability having turned out to be unfounded in law, we are now creating a new species of liability on a new contract—new for the first time to be implied as to a warranty of authority which, if the party now to be charged C had been required expressly to give, he would, possibly, have refused. If it is desirable to establish such a rule, it seems to me it should be done by legislative enactment, and that to establish it by judicial decision is to make the law which it is only our province to expound. Against this course, though in all humility, and with the utmost deference to the better opinions of my colleagues, I feel it my duty to record my protest. D

Appeal dismissed.

Libel—Plaintiff—Individual not named or specifically described—Evidence connecting plaintiff with words complained of—Question for jury.

If a libel, though not naming any individual or specifically describing him by any express form of words, nevertheless uses such language that persons acquainted with the circumstances have no doubt that the writer of the libel meant a certain individual, that individual has a right of action against the publisher of the libel. When a class is referred to, it is a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the libel refers to a member of that class. G

Libel—Innuendo—Extension of natural meaning of words complained of—Identification of plaintiff. H

The innuendo which is placed on words alleged to be defamatory cannot extend the natural meaning of those words. Where a libel does not expressly refer to the plaintiff recourse may be had to the innuendo pointing to the plaintiff as the person referred to in the libel.

Libel—Partnership—Libel referring to trading by partnership firm—Joint action by partners. I

Partners may maintain a joint action for a libel referring to the partnership firm in the trade which is carried on.

- G Wiseman v. Wiseman (1606), Cro. Jac. 107.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland affirming a decision of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland in an action of libel brought by the respondents, Messrs. Malcomson and others, the owners of a factory in the county of Waterford for the manufacture of cottons, linens, and other fabrics, against the appellants, Messrs. Le Fanu, the proprietors of "The Warder" newspaper, in respect of alleged defamatory matter published in the journal on June 1, 1844.

The respondents said that the passages in the newspaper complained of meant, and were intended to mean, that they, the plaintiffs in the action, had been and were guilty of tyranny and oppression towards their workpeople, sabbath breaking, and extortion. The alleged libel was as follows:

- I "THE FACTORY QUESTION IN IRELAND.

"We beg leave to invite the express attention of our readers to the following letter. We had no notion that the abuses of the factory system were so triumphant in this country; we scarcely thought that there were any factories in Ireland; but it seems that the abuses in the county of Waterford exceed even those committed in England. The Factory Bill must have been an United Kingdom bill, that is, a bill extending to the United Kingdom, and, therefore, of force in Ireland. If this be so, working on Sundays, or beyond the twelve hours limited, must be illegal, to say nothing of the breach of the common law in the desecration of the Sabbath, as the Christian religion is part and parcel of the common law of Great Britain and Ireland. The public must feel greatly indebted to our correspondent for his valuable communication. It is a discovery of an outrageous and tyrannical violation of the laws for the protection of the poor labourer; and we hope that the subject will be followed up. Our columns shall be ever open to vindicate the cause of the oppressed. It is scandalous that such slave-driving despotism should be practised with impunity.

“Power, when lodged in their [meaning the plaintiffs] possession, “Grows tyranny and rank oppression.”—GAY.

“Sir,—I beg you will say, in the next ‘Warder,’ whether there is a law at present in force which prevents the proprietors of factories from employing their operatives by night and on Sundays; and, if there is, who is supposed to enforce it. If the same tyranny is carried on in English factories as in some of the Irish ones [meaning the factory of the plaintiffs], the English members who opposed Lord Ashley’s motion can, I think, lay very little claim to humanity. Factories being much more numerous in England than in Ireland, the English members had a much better opportunity of knowing the great hardships to which the factory labourers are exposed than the Irish members. No person, unless one who is perfectly acquainted with the working of the Irish factories, can form any, the slightest, idea of the cruelties and miseries to which the Irish factory hands are subject.

“I know some factories [meaning the factory of the plaintiffs] in this country; and the cruelty with which the operatives in them [meaning the factory of the plaintiffs] are used, is really incredible. The cruelties of the slave trade or the Bastille are not equal to those practised in some of the Irish factories [meaning the factory of the plaintiffs, and meaning thereby that the plaintiffs had treated the persons in the employment in said factory with cruelty.]

“In this country, and I suppose in England also, the factory proprietors [meaning the plaintiffs] keep their own bread shop, their own grocer’s shop, their own shoe shop, their own butcher’s shop, etc., and they [meaning the plaintiffs] compel their operatives to buy bread from their baker, groceries from their grocer, shoes from their shoemaker, and meat from their butcher, though they [meaning the operatives in the employment of the plaintiffs] could purchase much superior articles in any other shop at a lower rate, but they [meaning the said operatives] dare not; if they did, they would be turned out of work [thereby meaning that, unless the persons in the employment of the said plaintiffs purchased the before-mentioned commodities of life from the plaintiffs, at an exorbitant or unfair rate, the said operatives would be deprived by the said plaintiffs of their employment]. [The writer of this letter had not, apparently, heard of the Truck Act, 1831.]

“If in one of the factory rooms [meaning in one of the rooms of the factory of the plaintiffs], where there are perhaps two or three hundred persons at work, a pane of glass is broken by accident, every person in the room is fined sixpence, and perhaps some of those wretched beings [meaning the said persons in the employment of the plaintiffs] who are thus fined, do not earn more than one shilling and sixpence or two shillings a week. Now, admitting the number in one room [meaning a room of the factory of the plaintiffs] not to exceed two hundred, the fine would amount to the enormous sum of five pounds for one pane of glass; and that is a thing frequently done.

“Whenever the proprietors [meaning the said plaintiffs] are in a hurry to get any work done, the hands [meaning the operatives in the employment of the plaintiffs] must work both by night and on Sundays until it is completed; and if one member of a family [meaning of a family in the employment of the plain-

A tiffs] refuse to work on the Sunday, the whole family are turned off on the following day. Incredible as this may appear, it is a positive fact. I have frequently seen them [meaning the operatives of the plaintiffs] on Sundays going in to work at a certain factory in the south of Ireland [meaning the factory of the plaintiffs]; and I beg, through the columns of your widely circulating paper, to call the attention of the authorities to it, in order that some

B measure may be taken to put a stop to such an iniquitous practice [meaning that the plaintiffs were in the habit of violating the due observance of the Sabbath, and calling on the authorities of the land to prevent such violation of the Sabbath day].

"We may talk of slavery in a foreign country; but if the present factory law allows this, and remains unchanged, we have worse, far worse, at home. We

C have given millions to abolish foreign slavery, and why not do away with slavery at home? [meaning that the labourers in the employment of the said plaintiffs were treated as slaves.] A laudable effort has been made by a few to alleviate the slavery at home, but that humane effort has been defeated by the power of a faction. I hope, however, before long to see humanity triumph over monopoly; and as your paper has always advocated the cause of the D oppressed, I beg you will use the power of 'The Warder' to do justice to the poor factory operatives of this country. I am, sir, your obedient and faithful servant, H."

The defendants denied liability. The action came on for trial at the spring assizes for the county of Waterford, in 1845, before LEFROY, B., and a special

E jury, when a general verdict with £500 damages was found for the plaintiffs. Upon this verdict judgment was entered in Easter Term, 1845. The defendants appealed to the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland, who affirmed the judgment of the Court of Exchequer. The defendants then appealed to the House of Lords.

T. F. Ellis for the appellants.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Q.C., and Cowling for the respondents.

F

LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.—I have paid great attention to the arguments raised in objection to the judgment pronounced below, and I see no reason to reverse that judgment.

The first proposition contended for is that this is a complaint of the publication of a libel which, although found by the jury as intended to apply to the plaintiffs

G in the action, is so framed that no innuendo, even after verdict, can support the declaration in which that complaint is made. The question is not whether the matter complained of is libellous, for about that no question can be raised. If it had been addressed to the plaintiffs by name, and it had been said that the plaintiffs had done so and so in their factory, no question could have been suggested but that that would have been libellous. But the way in which the plaintiffs are

H referred to is expressed by the term "some factories." It is said: "If the same tyranny is carried on in the English factories as in some of the Irish ones," and a little further it goes on:

"No person, unless one who is perfectly acquainted with the working of the Irish factories, can form any, the slightest, idea of the cruelties and miseries to which the Irish factory hands are subject. I know some factories in this

I country; and the cruelty with which the operatives in them are used is really incredible. The cruelties of the slave trade or the Bastille are not equal to those practised in some of the Irish factories."

The declaration, after introducing those words, has the innuendo—"meaning the factory of the plaintiff"; and the jurors have, by finding a verdict for the plaintiffs, found that the words were used in allusion to the factory of the plaintiffs.

In that state the question arose below, and arises here, whether the judgment founded upon that verdict can be maintained on such a declaration—that is to say, where terms are used which must have reference to some one (for the terms "some of the Irish factories" must evidently mean to apply to some Irish factories), and the innuendo is that the words do apply to the plaintiffs' factory, and the jurors have found that that innuendo is true, and that the plaintiffs, who are the proprietors and owners of a factory in Ireland, were the persons meant. If a party can publish a libel so framed as to describe individuals, though not naming them, and not specifically describing them by any express form of words, but still so describing them that it is known who they are, as the jurors have found it to be here, and if those who must be acquainted with the circumstances connected with the party described may also come to the same conclusion, and may have no doubt that the writer of the libel intended to mean those individuals, it would be opening a very wide door to defamation, if parties suffering all the inconvenience of being libelled were not permitted to have that protection which the law affords. If they are so described that they are known to all their neighbours as being the parties alluded to, and if they are able to prove to the satisfaction of a jury that the party writing the libel did intend to allude to them, it would be unfortunate to find the law in a state which would prevent the party being protected against such libels.

Some old cases were referred to, in which some singular opinions appear to have been expressed and some singular doctrines laid down, but I was anxious to find whether the counsel was able to refer to any modern case in which, after the jurors had found as in this case, the court had held that a party so circumstanced as the plaintiffs were here was not entitled to the benefit of a verdict so obtained. I have found none but Solomon v. Lawson (1), and that is supposed to be a case containing the law as it now exists on this subject. Expressions of LORD DENMAN, C.J., who delivered judgment in that case, have been relied on, but it is more important to look at the whole case, and see what it is to which that judgment was intended to apply. All expressions must be construed with reference to the matter then under consideration, and it is clear that the decision in that case turned on the point whether the matter was in fact libellous of a particular individual. Whether a right conclusion from the facts of the case was or was not drawn by the court in that instance is immaterial, but the judgment proceeded on that point. The language used by LORD DENMAN is:

"The question, therefore, is whether the alleged libel has any reference to the tank being used; and looking at the libel, I should say it certainly had not; it described injury arising from water having been supplied to shipping which had been kept in copper cisterns, and then it says 'it required the authorities to look after it.'"

So far from referring to any individual as having been the author of that mischief it says "it behoves the authorities at St. Helena," (that being the place where the injury was supposed to have been committed) "to look into it." Therefore, looking merely at the terms used, so far from being an imputation on any individual, it would appear to apply to some arrangement made by the authorities at St. Helena who had improperly permitted water to be kept in a copper tank instead of being kept in an iron reservoir. In the judgment of the court the alleged libel was not a libel on the individual complaining of it, but, if a libel at all, was a libel on the authorities. That is the ground on which LORD DENMAN put his judgment. He says:

"This does not impute a libel to anybody, no individual can come forward and say, I am the person intended to be referred to by the libel so used."

That being the only case in support of the argument that the individual libelled must be expressly named, or unmistakably referred to, and there being, I believe, a very general practice to the contrary, and common sense being entirely to the contrary, I cannot think the proposition is at all established that under the circumstances of this case the innuendo found to be proved by the jury is not sufficient to entitle the party to the remedy he asks.

A Other objections are made, applicable to particular counts in the declaration. The complaint is made by the plaintiffs in their character of owners and conductors of a factory, and in some of the counts, it is now said, they have made the complaint as if there was an injury to themselves individually, and not to them in their character as joint proprietors of the factory. It is very properly admitted that, if the count contains a complaint of that which affects them in their joint character as proprietors, though it may also make a complaint of certain matters which may affect them individually, inasmuch as the complaint of that which affects them in their joint character may be sufficient to support the action, the additional fact that the count also makes another complaint which cannot be maintained, is not sufficient to vitiate the judgment that has been pronounced. Therefore, in looking through these counts, we must see whether there is anything which contains matter applying to the plaintiffs individually, and not to their joint character.

I have looked through these counts, and it appears to me that, although there may be expressions which, taken by themselves, refer to the individual character of some of the plaintiffs, they contain matter which shows that the complaint is addressed to their character of joint proprietors of the factory. The fifth count states that the defendants

D "did compose and publish, etc., a certain other false, wicked, scandalous, and defamatory libel of and concerning the said plaintiffs and of and concerning the said factory of the said plaintiffs, and of and concerning the manufacturing of cottons, linens, and other fabrics by the said plaintiffs in the said factory, and of and concerning the said trade and calling of the said plaintiffs."

E Can it be contended that this is a complaint made of injury sustained by the plaintiffs in their individual character? Is it not in terms descriptive of the injury alleged to be sustained by them in their character of proprietors and managers of the factory in question? It seems to me to be clear that it is so, and that although there may be expressions which ought not to be there if the complaint was intended to be made of injury sustained by them in their character of joint proprietors, it is quite sufficient on every one of these counts to show that the complaint was intended to apply to the property which belonged to them jointly, in respect of which, therefore, they are entitled to support an action by themselves as proprietors.

On these grounds, on the two points which were relied on as objections to the judgment of the court below, I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

G LORD CAMPBELL.—I am likewise of opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

H The first objection which has been relied on by counsel for the appellants is that this libel applies to a class of persons, and that, therefore, an individual cannot apply it to himself. I am of opinion that that is contrary to all reason, and is not supported by any authority. It may well happen that the singular number is used, and where a class is described, it may very well be that the slander refers to a particular individual. That is a matter of which evidence is to be laid before the jury, and the jurors are to determine whether, when a class is referred to, the individual who complains that the slander applied to him is justified in making such complaint. That is clearly a reasonable principle, because whether a man is called by one name, or whether he is called by another, or whether he is described by a pretended description of a class to which he is known to belong, if those who look on, know well who is aimed at, the very same injury is inflicted, the very same thing is done, as would be done if his name and Christian name were ten times repeated.

I Where is the authority for the argument which has been urged by the plaintiff in error? Counsel for the appellants relies on Solomon v. Lawson (1), but the proposition there laid down, and which I adopt, is that where there is a publication or a sentence spoken verbally which clearly conveys an imputation of crime on some person, in that case it may by innuendo be applied to the plaintiffs. If that proposition is well supported in law, the objection made here fails because, in this case, there clearly is a gross imputation on some individuals, and the question is whether it may not be applied to the plaintiffs. What is there to show that that proposition is not well founded according to authority? There is Solomon v. Lawson (1), but there it was an historical fact that was narrated; all that was there stated might be true, without imputing blame to any person. There was no charge brought against either a class or an individual, and by mere innuendo you cannot give a new sense to words which they do not naturally bear. It comes round to the old rule that you cannot by an innuendo extend the natural meaning of the words which are spoken or written, but by the innuendo you may point out the particular individual to whom these words apply, those words, in themselves, clearly imputing a crime on the part of some one individual. That being so, I think, according to principle and authority, this objection ought to be overruled. A

The other objection which is relied upon is that this is an action brought by several persons, seven I think, and that no joint injury is pointed out on the record, but a joint injury is pointed out on the record if the libel is speaking of them in a trade which they jointly carry on. The declaration here alleges that the plaintiffs are partners in carrying on this factory in Ireland, and it alleges that the libel is speaking of them in their trade, and there are innuendoes applying the different parts of the libel to the plaintiffs in their trade. Assuredly that is not enough, unless the language employed will naturally bear the interpretation put on it, and can be shown to refer to them. Then does it so refer to them? I think it does. D

There is another count, the fourth count, in which the libel imputes to the owners of these factories that they are guilty of gross oppression; and the fifth count is respecting the working in the factory. All these impute misconduct to the plaintiffs in carrying on their factory, and they all relate to the trade of the plaintiffs. Suppose that several persons were in partnership as grocers, and it was alleged that they sold by short measure or false weight, or that they adulterated their goods. They might bring a joint action for that; it would be an allegation as to the manner in which the business was carried on, and I apprehend wherever there is libel or slander imputing to partners that they fraudulently and contrary to law employ a particular mode to carry on business, that is a libel in which they must be jointly included as partners in their trade. I know of no case which at all impugns that proposition, and, therefore, I am of opinion that this is a case in which the plaintiffs below, being libelled as regards the manner in which they carry on their trade, sustain a joint injury, for which they may maintain a joint action. Marriage—Presumption of marriage—Rebuttal—Need of strong, clear, satisfactory evidence—Disproof of every reasonable possibility supporting legality.

The presumption of law in favour of the legality of a marriage is not to be lightly repelled. The evidence to rebut it must be strong, distinct, satisfactory, and conclusive; per LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.

I should say "clear, distinct, and satisfactory evidence." I do not like ever to lay down the rule that evidence must be "conclusive," because that gives occasion very frequently to needless and inconvenient doubt: per LORD BROUGHAM.

D

A presumption of this sort in favour of a marriage can only be negated by disproving every reasonable possibility which supports the validity of the marriage: per LORD CAMPBELL.

G

Appeal from a decree of BRADY, L.C., in the Court of Chancery in Ireland in a suit instituted by the appellants, the daughters of Sir John Bennett Piers and Lady Piers to compel the respondent, Sir H. S. Piers, who was in possession of certain estates in Ireland, to raise a sum of £4,000, by sale, if necessary, of a part of those estates in pursuance of a charge thereon, which their father had created.

H

The appellants claimed as lawfully born children of the late Sir John Piers. The respondent, the nephew of their father, had succeeded to the title and the entailed estates. By a marriage settlement, Sir John had a power to create a jointure in favour of his wife of £600 per annum, and also to charge the estates with £4,000 in favour of younger children. Both these powers Sir John had executed in his lifetime.

I

In 1803, Sir John went to reside in the Isle of Man with a female of the name of Denny, by whom he had several children. In 1815, the lady becoming again pregnant, Sir John expressed a wish to solemnise a marriage with her in order that his future children by her should inherit his property, and on May 21, 1815, the ceremony was performed by one of the curates of St. George's, at Douglas, Isle of Man, a chapel of ease to the parish of Bradden in that island, the curate, being a member of the Church of England, had been chaplain to a former Bishop of Sodor and Man. The fact of marriage was not disputed, but it was contended to have been an illegal marriage as the ceremony had taken place at the private residence of Sir John Piers in the island and no special licence, as required by the relevant statute of the Isle of Man, for such a marriage, had been obtained. In the suit, the Bishop of Rochester, who, at the time in question was Bishop of Sodor and Man, deposed that he had not granted any special licence authorising the marriage. One of the reasons given by him for coming to the conclusion that he had not granted any such licence was that he must have been aware of the fact that Sir John had been living in a state of concubinage with Miss Denny for many years, and another was that he would not, under any circumstances, have granted a licence without a personal application from Sir John, which he felt positive had never been made to him. Evidence had also been given to show that Sir John and Lady Piers had celebrated a second marriage in 1821, in Dublin, and that the appellants had been born between the time of the first marriage in 1815 and the second in 1821. The fact of the second marriage was, among other things, relied on as evidence against the presumption of the first marriage, coupled as it was with the non-production of a special licence, or the entry of the marriage in any registry or other official document. The execution of the deed of settlement by Sir John, by which he settled the jointure on his wife, and raised the charge on the estate in favour of his future children by her was also proved.

Mar. 22, 1849. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.—This is an appeal from the decision of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland as to the legal validity of the marriage upon which the legitimacy, and, therefore, the rights of the appellants, depended. It appears that the Lord Chancellor ultimately decided that point on the evidence before him, but he, at the same time, offered an issue, which he thought would try the question of the validity of the marriage. The issue which he offered to the parties was “whether there had been a special licence from the Bishop of Sodor and Man, authorising the clergyman of that island to celebrate the marriage.” It does appear to me that the issue so tendered goes very much to explain the ground upon which the Lord Chancellor decided the case, because it shows that, according to the view which he took of it, the question in dispute depended upon the greater or less weight of the evidence upon the one side or the other; otherwise the issue would not reach the question so as to decide upon the validity of the marriage. Such an issue would rest upon the balance of evidence as to a particular fact, upon the result of which the validity of the marriage undoubtedly would depend, but that is not the mode in which the law contemplates matters of proof relating to the lawfulness of a marriage. It entirely lays aside all that strong legal presumption [in favour of the legality of a marriage] upon which the law proceeds in the case of marriage, and adjudicates upon the point as upon any other matter of fact, with respect to which there is no presumption one way or the other, but where, upon the result of the investigation as to the existence of the fact, the right of the parties might depend.

I have not found that the rule of law is anywhere laid down more to my satisfaction than it is by LORD LYNDBURST in Morris v. Davies (1), as determined in this House. It is not precisely the same presumption as exists in the present case, but the principal is strictly applicable to the presumption which we are considering. He says (5 Cl. & Fin. at p. 265):

“The presumption of law is not lightly to be repelled. It is not to be broken in upon or shaken by a mere balance of probability. The evidence for the purpose of repelling it must be strong, distinct, satisfactory and conclusive.”

No doubt, every case must vary as to how far the evidence may be considered as “satisfactory and conclusive”; but he lays down this rule that the presumption must prevail unless it is most satisfactorily repelled by the evidence in the cause appearing conclusive to those who have to decide upon that question.

A Applying that rule to the circumstances of this case, he could not but arrive at the opinion that the marriage which had taken place in 1815 ought to be maintained with regard to the difficulty raised by the respondent because the second marriage had taken place, he did not consider that that fact affected the question as it was well known and admitted that many persons who had been properly and legally married abroad again went through a ceremony on returning to their own country. Therefore, he moved the judgment of the House that the decree of the court below should be reversed, and the charge on the estates of the respondent, created in favour of the appellants, the children of the marriage, should be declared a good and valid charge thereon.

C LORD BROUGHAM.—I am altogether of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. I consider the rule of law to have been very clearly laid down in Morris v. Davies (1), by my noble and learned friend, LORD LYNTHURST. He there laid down that rule in very plain terms, and if I had any doubt as to any one of the four descriptions which he gave of the evidence required to rebut the legal presumption of legitimacy, it is as to the last. I should say "clear, distinct, and satisfactory evidence." I am not quite prepared to use the word "conclusive." I think some D doubt may arise upon that, which it is unnecessary to raise because if the evidence required be clear and satisfactory, that is quite sufficient for me. I do not like ever to lay down the rule that evidence must be "conclusive," because that gives occasion very frequently to needless and inconvenient doubt. I agree that this case was wrongly decided below and that the decision must be reversed.

E LORD CAMPBELL.—It seems to me that this case depends entirely upon the effect to be given to the presumption of law in favour of the marriage. It is allowed that there is a presumption in its favour, and, until the contrary is proved, we are bound to draw the inference that everything existed which was necessary to constitute a valid marriage, and among other things, that there was a special licence from the Bishop of Sodor and Man. But it is likewise admitted, on the other F hand, that this is not a praesumptio juris, that it may be rebutted, and that it can only stand subject to the contrary being proved. The whole question, therefore, depends upon what sort of evidence is required to prove the negative, and to give effect to it. It seems to me, my Lords, as if the learned Lord Chancellor of Ireland had been of opinion that the only effect of the presumption was to shift the burden of proof, and that, instead of the party who stood on the validity of the marriage being obliged to show that there was a licence, it lay on the other side G to impeach the validity of the marriage and prove that there was no licence. It seems to me that that is entirely contrary to well established principles of law which have been long laid down and acted upon for the security of marriage. Indeed, leading counsel for the respondent allowed at the Bar, as he was bound to do, that that was not the mode in which the validity of the marriage was to be tried, and H said that you must show a high degree of probability that there was not a licence. That comes pretty much within the definition of the mode in which the presumption is to be rebutted which has been cited from LORD LYNTHURST, by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, and acquiesced in by my noble and learned friend who last addressed your Lordships with some slight modification. My opinion is that a presumption of this sort in favour of a marriage can only be negated by I disproving every reasonable possibility. I do not mean to say that you must show the impossibility of any supposition which can be suggested to support the validity of the marriage, but you must show that this is most highly improbable, that it is not reasonably possible. Because, otherwise there is a tremendous responsibility cast upon you with regard to the status of this woman and of the appellants. See the peril which you are encountering; you may be deciding that a woman is a concubine and that the children are bastards upon a mere speculation, when, in fact, contrary evidence may afterwards be produced, when it is too late, to show that there was that in existence which would render the marriage valid, the woman the wife of the person to whom she was married, and the children legitimate. To avoid such a peril, the law requires that you should negative every reasonable possibility. . . . I must draw your Lordships' attention to the presumption of law which requires a judge not to exercise his own private notion or to indulge in his own private opinions upon the subject, but to believe that everything was solemnly and effectively done. That is greatly strengthened here by the facts of the case. It appears to me that the presumption of law which exists in this case and is strengthened by the facts, is not at all met by contrary evidence.

Appeal allowed.

CROFT v. LUMLEY AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale), June 29, 30, 1857, February 15, 17, 1858]

[Reported 6 H.L.Cas. 672; 27 L.J.Q.B. 321; 31 L.T.O.S. 382; 22 J.P. 639; 4 Jur.N.S. 903; 6 W.R. 523; 10 E.R. 1459]

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant—Covenant to "improve" opera house for performing operas, plays, etc.—House closed when not remunerative to open—Covenant not to let stalls for longer than one year—Stalls let for year from future date—Covenant not to charge or encumber demised property—Grant by lessee of warrants of attorney.

The appellant let an opera house to the first respondent who entered into certain covenants on the breach of which a right of entry was reserved.

Held: (i) keeping the opera house shut for two seasons because it would not have paid to open it was not a breach of a covenant by which the lessee undertook that he would "use his utmost endeavours to improve the house" for performing operas, plays, etc., the covenant on its true construction referring to the lessee maintaining proper scenery and having the house painted and kept in order; (ii) letting some stalls to hold for one year from a future date was not a breach of a covenant not to let boxes or stalls "for any longer period than one year": quære, what would be the position if a lease were granted made to a lessee for one year and at the same time leases were granted to begin at the end of the first year and so on; (iii) granting warrants of attorney authorising judgment to be forthwith entered, the warrants being given bona fide to secure debts and to avoid the expense and delay of legal proceedings and not colourably to evade a prohibition against assignment, was not a breach of a covenant "not to charge or encumber the theatre by mortgaging the same or granting any rentcharge or any other encumbrance whatsoever," for all that the parties meant to do by the covenant was to guard against a direct encumbrance on the house.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber (CRESSWELL, WILLIAMS and CROWDER, JJ., MARTIN and ALDERSON, BB.), reported 5 E. & B. 682, affirming a decision of the Queen's Bench (LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., COLERIDGE, WIGHTMAN and ERLE, JJ.), reported 5 E. & B. 648, in an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiff, Faithful Croft, to recover possession of the Opera-house in the Haymarket.

In 1845 the plaintiff demised the premises as to part for sixty-six years from Sept. 29, 1825, and as to the other parts for fifty-one years from Sept. 29, 1840. In the lease a power of re-entry was reserved to the plaintiff in case the reserved annual rent of £1,934 14s. should not be paid, or in case certain covenants in the lease should not be performed. The covenants, so far as material, were three: (i) that the lessee should not convert the opera-house to any other use than that of performing operas, plays, etc., but should, during all the terms, use his utmost endeavours to improve the same for that use and purpose; (ii) that the lessee should not, without the lessor's previous leave in writing, assign, let, charge or dispose of the boxes or stalls of the theatre, or any of them (except a certain number of boxes and stalls to be selected as in the lease mentioned), for any term or number of years whatsoever or for any longer period than one year or season; (iii) that the lessee should not charge or encumber the theatre, or the income thereof, or the terms thereby granted, or either of them, or any part thereof respectively, by mortgaging the same or granting any rentcharge or any other encumbrance whatsoever. The action of ejectment was commenced on Dec. 28, 1854, on the ground that Lumley, the lessee, had broken these covenants.

The defendant Lumley appeared and defended the action, and the other defendants were allowed to appear and defend on the ground that they claimed rights to various parts of the property under the defendant Lumley.

The action was tried at the Middlesex sittings after Hilary Term, 1855, when a verdict was taken by consent, subject to the opinion of the court on a Special Case, which set forth the material facts as follows: As to the covenant not to convert the opera-house to any other use than that of acting operas, etc., and to use his utmost endeavours to improve the same, the breach was attempted to be proved as follows. The defendant used the opera during the season up to August, 1852, when the season closed for that year. Since then the opera-house had not been opened for entertainments of any sort, but it had not been converted to any other uses than those contemplated by the lease. It was given in evidence, by a competent witness, that the fact of the house not having been opened since 1852 was injurious to the property. There was no evidence that the defendant had not used his best endeavours to keep the house open every season. As to the covenant not to grant or let boxes or stalls for more than one year, the evidence of a breach was as follows. By an indenture of Aug. 5, 1852, Lumley for valuable consideration let to Hughes certain boxes to hold from Feb. 1, 1853, or from such subsequent day during 1853 upon which the opera-house should be first opened, for the full term of one year to be computed from that date, provided, if the theatre should not be opened during 1853, then for the same period during any future year. As to the covenant not to charge or encumber the opera-house, the evidence of a breach was as follows. On Oct. 6, 1852, Lumley granted a warrant of attorney to Hughes, authorising an attorney to confess judgment, etc. The defeasance recited an indenture, and expressly bore that the judgment to be entered up was intended to be a concurrent security for £290. Judgment was entered up on Oct. 20, 1852, and registered on Dec. 30, 1852. Other warrants of attorney were granted and judgment signed and registered, the defendants being bona fide.

A On Oct. 26, 1854, it was arranged that Mr. Martelli, as the authorised agent of the plaintiff, should call on Mr. Barnes, of the firm of Lyon, Barnes and Ellis, acting on the part of Mr. Lumley. Mr. Barnes having called accordingly, produced a sum of money equal to the amount of the Midsummer and Michaelmas rent, and on behalf of the defendant tendered the amount to Martelli, stating that he tendered to him the half-year's rent due at Michaelmas, and that he did so without any
B condition or reservation. Martelli stated that he would not receive the money as rent due under an existing unforfeited lease, but that he was willing to accept it as compensation for the occupation merely and without prejudice to the lessor's right of re-entry for breach of covenant. Mr. Barnes thereupon said that he assented to no such condition; that he tendered the money unconditionally as rent due, and that as rent Mr. Martelli must take it or leave it. After some further
C conversation, in which Martelli and Barnes adhered to their intention previously expressed, Martelli took up the money, saying at the time of so taking it that he took it as compensation for the occupation of the premises merely, and not as rent due under an existing and unforfeited lease, and that he did not waive the lessor's right of re-entry, but expressly reserved it. No receipt was asked for or given.

The Court of Queen's Bench decided that the lease had been forfeited by reason
D of the giving of the warrants of attorney and the judgments signed thereon, but that the forfeitures, both those known and those unknown to Mr. Martelli, had been waived by his having under the circumstances mentioned in the Case received a sum of money tendered as two quarters' rent. On appeal, the Court of Exchequer Chamber decided that the lease had been forfeited, but gave no opinion as to the waiver of the forfeiture. The plaintiff appealed to the House of Lords, and the E following judges attended, MARTIN, BRAMWELL, CHANNELL and WATSON, BB., and ERLE, CROMPTON, WILLIAMS, WIGHTMAN and COLERIDGE, JJ.

Sir Richard Bethell, Q.C., H. Hill, Q.C., and Unthank for the appellant.

Sir Frederick Thesiger, Q.C., Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Q.C., Lush, Wells and Maude for the respondents.

F At the conclusion of the arguments the House put the following questions to the judges: (i) Whether the Special Case discloses a breach of the covenant not to grant, let, or otherwise dispose of any of the boxes or stalls of the theatre for any longer period than one year or one season? (ii) Whether the Special Case discloses a breach of the covenant not to charge or encumber the theatre, or any part thereof?
G (iii) Whether, by reason of such breaches (if any), or either of them, the appellant acquired a right of re-entry on the theatre, or any part thereof? (iv) Whether such right of re-entry (if any) was waived by the appellant? The judges all answered question (i) in the negative; seven out of the nine answered question (ii) in the negative; of the remaining two one thought there was a breach of the covenant not to encumber, but that the right of re-entry was waived by the subsequent acceptance of rent, while the other thought that there was a breach and no waiver.

H Their Lordships took time for consideration.

April 17, 1858. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD CRANWORTH.—This was an action of ejectment which was brought by the appellant, Croft, against the respondent, Lumley, and a number of other persons, to recover possession of the opera-house in the Haymarket, London. The respondent
I Lumley is the lessee of the opera-house under the appellant. The other respondents need only be described as persons who have an interest under Lumley. The ejectment was brought upon a right of entry which was reserved in the lease from Croft to Lumley for breach of several covenants. At the trial a verdict by consent was taken for the appellant, subject to a Special Case. The Court of Queen's Bench was of opinion that there was no breach of any covenant, except the covenant not to charge. Lumley having given warrants of attorney (under which it is hardly necessary to say the persons to whom the warrants were given, by entering up judgment, might eventually take in execution, and so obtain possession of the property, as to which it was covenanted that there should be no charge), the Queen's Bench held that the giving of those warrants of attorney was a breach of the covenant not to charge. But that court also held that that was immaterial because the right of re-entry was gone by reason of the appellant Croft having accepted rent after he had notice of the breach in question. Therefore, the Queen's Bench held that there should be judgment for the respondents, holding that there was a breach of one covenant, and one only, the covenant not to encumber, but that as to that covenant, though there was a breach which gave a right of re-entry, that right of re-entry was gone by reason of the waiver or abandonment of it by the landlord having accepted rent after he had notice of the breach.

The appellant was dissatisfied with that decision of the Queen's Bench, and took the case to the Court of Exchequer Chamber and that court, having had the matter elaborately argued before them, came to a conclusion having the same result as that at which the Queen's Bench had arrived, though not exactly upon the same grounds, for whereas the Queen's Bench had held that there was no breach of any covenant but one, but that no advantage could be taken of that breach because there had been a waiver, the Exchequer Chamber held that there had been no breach of any of the covenants, and, consequently, that the judgment for the respondents was right, they not meaning to say that they did not concur with the Court of Queen's Bench as to there having been a waiver if there had been a breach of the covenant. From that decision the appellant appealed to your LORDSHIPS' HOUSE.

With regard to the alleged breach of the covenant that Lumley would use his best endeavours to improve the opera-house for the purpose for which it was demised to him, of which it was alleged there was a breach by his not having kept it open in the seasons of 1853 and 1854, your Lordships at the time of the argument intimated a very strong and decided opinion that there was no pretence for saying that there had been any breach of the covenant upon that ground; that the meaning of the covenant was that he should, by having proper scenery, and by having the house properly painted and kept in order, improve the house, but not, if he found that there would be no benefit in opening the house, if it would not pay the expenses of having theatrical representations at all, that he should at his loss, with no benefit to the landlord, keep it open. Your Lordships expressed so clear an opinion upon that point at the time of the argument, that your Lordships did not desire even to hear what the opinions of the learned judges upon it were and did not put any question to them on that point. I happen to know by communicating with them at the time that they never had the slightest doubt upon the subject.

In this state of things, it is now your Lordships' duty to decide in the first place upon the first question upon which all the learned judges concur. I think there can be no possible doubt that your Lordships will at once accede to the view which they took on that subject. This is a question as to the forfeiture of a lease. The covenant is that the lessee will not underlease any of the boxes or stalls for more than one year or one season. The leases in question which were considered to be breaches of that covenant were leases entered into in the month of August, 1853, for the year commencing from February, 1852. That was not the exact form of all of them, but that statement will substantially embrace the whole question as to that breach. It is said that that is a breach of the covenant not to lease for more than one year, but the learned judges all hold that is not so. How is that a breach of the covenant not to lease for more than a year? It is a lease for only one year. The covenant is that he will not lease for more than a year. He has not leased for more than a year, and, therefore, he has not in terms broken the covenant. I doubt whether we ought to go beyond that. But it was said that that construction might enable the lessee entirely to defeat the primary object of the parties to this covenant. I do not think it is so at all. We need not decide what would be the case if a lease had been made to a party for one year and at the same time there had been made a lease for another year to commence at the end of the first year, and so on. It might be that that might have been held to be a lease for more than a year, although in point of fact it may appear to be otherwise, but that

A is not the question which we have to decide. But this is simply a question whether in form or in substance it is any violation of the covenant to have made a lease which was to endure for one year and one year only, commencing at the beginning of the ensuing season. I am of opinion that it was not, and that, therefore, the learned judges are quite right.

B The second alleged breach is certainly one which gives rise to more difficulty, namely, whether the warrants of attorney which have been given were or were not a breach of the covenant not to encumber. The warrants of attorney relied upon are these. There was a warrant to Hughes on June 25, 1852, to confess judgment for £2,000, with a declaration that it was merely as a security for £1,140, being the amount of a great number of bills of exchange which were enumerated and would become due in the ensuing months of August, September and October. Upon that judgment was signed and duly registered both in the office and in the county of Middlesex. There was another warrant of attorney on July 29, 1852, for £2,200, to secure £1,070 on Sept. 30, upon which judgment was also signed, and there was another upon Oct. 6, 1852, for £12,000 to secure £6,000. There were also a number of judge's orders, I think from twelve to twenty, to secure sums of money, for which Lumley had been sued, which orders had been given (I think in every case it is so stated) after issue had been joined, and all for bona fide debts. The question here arises upon the Judgments Act, 1838, s. 13 [replaced by Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 195] whether these instruments do or do not amount to such an assignment or charge of the property as to constitute a breach of the covenant not to encumber. Section 13 enacts :

E "A judgment already entered up or to be hereafter entered up against any person in any of Her Majesty's superior courts . . . shall operate as a charge on all lands, tenements, rectories, advowsons, tithes, rents and hereditaments . . . of or to which such person shall at the time of entering up such judgment, or at any time afterwards be seised, possessed or entitled for any estate or interest whatever at law or in equity, whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy, or over which such person shall at the time of entering up
F such judgment, or at any time afterwards, have any disposing power which he might without the assent of any other person exercise for his own benefit, and shall be binding as against the person against whom judgment be so entered up, and against all persons claiming under him after such judgment, and shall also be binding as against the issue of his body, and all other persons whom he might without the assent of any other person cut off and debar from any
G remainder reversion or other interest in or out of the said lands . . . and every judgment creditor shall have such and the same remedies in a court of equity, against the hereditaments so charged by virtue of this Act, or any part thereof, as he would be entitled to in case the person against whom such judgment shall have been entered up had power to charge the same hereditaments, and had
H by writing under his hand agreed to charge the same with the amount of such judgment-debt."

The question is whether a warrant of attorney given under the circumstances stated in this case—namely, bona fide given to secure debts, and nothing more being stated than that—does or does not amount to giving an encumbrance within the meaning of this clause? This is a point which has been several times of late
I under discussion. I have more than once, in the discharge of my official duties, had occasion to consider it; and I confess it is a point upon which I have very often had great difficulty in making up my mind, but in the result I adhere to the opinion which I expressed in this House two or three years ago in the course of the argument of Lane v. Horlock (1), that this is a point upon which it is impossible to state any abstract opinion which shall govern every case. I am of opinion, as I there stated, that simply giving a warrant of attorney, if it is bona fide given to secure a debt which the creditor might recover by process of law, does not constitute a charge within the meaning of that statute. But if a person, not having a power of assigning or charging the property, gives a warrant of attorney with a view to evade that restriction which is imposed upon him, then the circumstances may be such as to make it amount to a charge, or encumbrance, or at least to estop him from saying that it is not a charge or encumbrance to all intents and purposes. The distinction is admirably illustrated by Doe d. Mitchinson v. Carter (2), in which the principle was elucidated in both its aspects, for, in the first instance, there had been an ejectment brought, and there it was found that a party who was restrained from assigning had given a warrant of attorney. The Court of Queen's Bench, after a long argument, held that that did not amount to a breach of the restriction against his charging. He could not help his creditors bringing an action and recovering judgment, and if he, to save the expense and vexation and delay of an action, gave a warrant of attorney in order to close the proceedings at once, the court held that he might lawfully do that in order to arrest the legal consequences, and that, therefore, that was no breach. But a second ejectment was afterwards brought, in which upon a special verdict it was found that the lessee, wishing to assign the property, entered into a compact with the person to whom it was to be assigned, and because he could not do that per directum he gave him a warrant of attorney, which would enable him to take the property in execution. When that second verdict came to be considered the Court of King's Bench held that that entirely varied the case, the warrant of attorney was held to be a breach of the covenant not to assign, and judgment was given accordingly.

Applying that principle to the present case, in advising your Lordships, I am to say whether there is upon the face of this Special Case anything which ought to satisfy your Lordships that the giving of this warrant of attorney was a contrivance by Mr. Lumley to effect an assignment which he could not effect directly. I think there is nothing to warrant any such conclusion. In the first place, although it is stated that it was known to the creditor Mr. Hughes that Mr. Lumley was the lessee of the opera-house, I do not find it anywhere distinctly stated that that was the moving cause on his part, but it would be necessary to show, not merely that it was the moving cause on his part, but that it was known to Lumley that he had not the power to assign and that he gave this warrant of attorney for the purpose of enabling him to do that which he could not do according to the terms of his lease. I think that when we look at what occurred afterwards it is perfectly clear that that was not the meaning of the parties, and that in point of fact no proceedings have ever been adopted in order to get possession of the opera-house. The warrants of attorney remain just as they were, the property of Mr. Hughes—whether they have been paid or not is not stated. It does not appear that the opera-house was transferred from the one party to the other. It remains just as it was. Therefore, upon this point I am inclined to advise your Lordships most strongly to concur in the opinions of seven out of the nine learned judges who heard the case, and I should, accordingly, move that your Lordships should give judgment for the respondents.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—I have no difficulty in concurring in the advice which has just been given by my noble and learned friend, and I have very little to add to the reasons which he has given for that advice.

There are three covenants contained in the lease which are alleged to have been broken. The first is that the lessee will not, during the term demised to him, convert the opera-house, or any part thereof, to any other use than for "acting or performing operas, plays, concerts, balls, masquerades, etc.," and that he will, during all the said term, use his utmost endeavours to improve the same for that use and purpose. The breach alleged is that he did not do that. The evidence is that there was a part of the term during which the opera-house was not open. The Court of Queen's Bench were of opinion that the lessee's conduct in this respect was not a breach of the covenant, and the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber confirmed that. Upon this point no opinion has been given by the learned judges, as your Lordships, feeling no doubt upon it, did not think

A it necessary to put any question to the judges upon that part of the case. It is quite out of the question to say that that covenant has been broken.

The next covenant is that the lessee, during the continuance of this term, would not

B "grant away, assign or let, charge or dispose of the boxes or stalls of the theatre or any of them for any term or number of years whatsoever, or for any longer period than one year or season."

The lessee granted a term in futuro, and the Court of Queen's Bench were of opinion that that was not a breach of the covenant, the meaning of which was that he should let the boxes only for one season. In that opinion the Court of Exchequer Chamber concurred; and all the learned judges, in the opinions they

C opinion I entirely agree.

The third covenant raises a more important question. It was that the lessee would not charge or encumber the theatre

D "or the income thereof, or the terms hereby granted or either of them, or any part thereof respectively, by mortgaging the same or granting any rentcharges, or any other encumbrance or encumbrances whatsoever."

The breach alleged of that covenant was that he did grant an encumbrance by giving a warrant of attorney to enter up judgment, and that by virtue of that warrant of attorney judgment was entered up, in consequence of which it was said that he had committed a breach of the covenant by charging the theatre. The Court of Queen's Bench, in their unanimous opinion which was delivered by LORD CAMPBELL, held

E that that was a breach of the covenant to encumber; that every man must be considered as contemplating the result of his acts; that if Lumley gave a warrant of attorney and the effect of that warrant was, under the Judgments Act, 1838, that upon it the property would be charged exactly in the same way as if he had given an equitable charge upon it, he must be considered to have contemplated that result, and that, therefore, it was a breach of that covenant. That was the F opinion which the Court of Queen's Bench expressed. From that there was [an appeal] to the Exchequer Chamber. That court formed a different conclusion. They were unanimously of opinion that what had been done did not fall within the terms of this covenant.

I agree entirely in the view which they took of this covenant, because, if we look at the terms of the covenant, it is not a covenant that he will do nothing whereby the estate may be encumbered, but it is a covenant that he will not

G "charge or encumber the theatre or the term by mortgaging of the same"—that is a direct charge—"or by granting any rentcharges"—that is also a direct charge—"or by granting any other encumbrance or encumbrances whatsoever." That clearly means the same as the former words of the same nature—that he will not

H grant any direct charge or encumbrance. If the terms of the covenant were that he would do no act whereby the property should become encumbered, then there is no doubt he would be guilty of a breach of the covenant by giving a warrant of attorney, which, by the operation of the Act of 1838, might cause an encumbrance upon the theatre. The argument noscitur a sociis applies here, and it is clear that all that the parties meant to do was to guard against the direct encumbrance

I upon the theatre. In that opinion all the judges concur.

Appeal dismissed.

Guarantee—Discharge—Co-sureties —Guarantee not signed by one surety—Other surety not informed.

The release by a creditor to one of two co-sureties is a release to the other.

The deed securing a loan granted by an insurance company to a debtor contained a covenant by the plaintiff and his co-surety that they or one of them would be responsible for, and would pay, any moneys due from the debtor to the insurance company and being unpaid by him. Only the plaintiff signed the deed, which was kept by the insurance company who did not inform him that his co-surety had not signed it. The debtor defaulted.

Held: the intention of the parties to the deed was that there should be a joint and several liability on the part of the two co-sureties, the deed being prepared and executed on that basis, and, as that course had not been followed, the plaintiff was relieved of his liability as a surety and entitled to delivery up of the deed for cancellation.

- F Appeal from a decision of PAGE-WOOD, V.-C., infra, in an action by the plaintiff, Evans, for an injunction to restrain all further proceedings in an action at law against him, and for the delivery up of an indenture in order that it might be cancelled; or, for a declaration that he in equity was not liable thereunder, or that he was liable for a moiety only of the amount intended to be thereby secured.
- In 1849 the Rev. George Elton applied to the Anchor Life Assurance Co. for the loan of £210, which sum they agreed to advance upon Elton's insuring his life with them for £400 and procuring two responsible sureties for the repayment of the principal and interest on the £210. The policy was duly effected with the company, and an indenture executed, expressed to be made between the Rev. George Elton of the first part; the plaintiff and one William Bradley of the second part; and the defendants Brembridge, Wertheimer and Wilson, on behalf of the assurance company, of the third part. By that indenture Elton covenanted with the defendants to pay the principal and interest on the £210 by instalments as therein mentioned, and the premiums on the policy of assurance; and in case of any default on the part of Elton in the aforesaid payments, the indenture purported to contain a covenant by the plaintiff and Bradley, that they, or one of them, would be responsible for, and would pay, any moneys due from Elton, under that indenture, to the company, and unpaid by him. The indenture was executed by Elton, by the plaintiff, and by the company, and retained in the possession of the company.
- G The £210 was duly advanced to, and received by, Elton. Default was made in payment of the first instalment of the principal and interest; when the defendants wrote to the plaintiff and called upon him for payment thereof "as one of the two co-sureties" of the said George Elton under the aforesaid indenture. The plaintiff then applied to his co-surety Bradley, and discovered that he had never executed the indenture. The plaintiff had executed it, on the faith that Bradley would also execute it. The assurance company did not inform the plaintiff, when they advanced the money to Elton, that Bradley had not then executed the indenture; A nor did they afterwards disclose that fact to the plaintiff; but applied to him in the manner above stated.

In 1855 the assurance company brought an action against the plaintiff, to recover the whole amount then due to them for principal and interest on the £210. To that action the plaintiff pleaded an equitable plea, to the effect that he had never executed the indenture as sole surety for Elton, but as intending to be co-surety B with Bradley, and he had instituted this suit, filing his bill for an injunction as stated above.

Cur. adv. vult. C

Dec. 11, 1855. PAGE-WOOD, V.-C.—The material point which I have to determine in this case is, whether the plaintiff, who executed an indenture, as one of two intended co-sureties to the Anchor Life Assurance Co. for the repayment of a sum of £210 and interest, advanced by them to Elton, is entitled to the relief in this court which he prays by his bill. That relief, so far as this part of D the consideration is involved, is, that he may have the indenture delivered up to be cancelled, or be declared liable to a moiety only, and not to the whole amount thereby intended to be secured to the office.

As to the form of the indenture, there was no sort of question made; it was prepared by the assurance company, in the ordinary form always adopted by them; and the evident intention of all parties to it—I say of all parties, because, though E Bradley did not execute it, the intention that he should do so is sufficiently apparent on the face of the instrument—the intention was, that the plaintiff and Bradley should be jointly and severally bound to the insurance office for the money advanced by them to Elton. The plaintiff executed the deed, but Bradley did not.
The company retained possession of the deed, and advanced Elton the money upon it; but, although they themselves knew that Bradley had never executed it, they F not only never communicated that fact to the plaintiff when they advanced the money, but they allowed him to remain in ignorance of it until they called upon him “as one of two co-sureties” to repay the whole sum advanced by them to Elton.

Upon this state of things, it is of course impossible to hold the plaintiff liable for the whole amount; but is he liable for the moiety? or has he any relief in equity as to that? That depends upon the state of the authorities in reference to G the subject-matter of this case so far as they can be brought to bear upon it. Ex parte Gifford (1) appeared to me at first to have considerable bearing upon the present case. There LORD ELDON seems to have intimated an opinion that, if, the moment after a joint and several security has been entered into between a creditor and two or more co-sureties for a debtor, the creditor releases one of the co-sureties, he may do so without discharging the others or the other of them from his or their H liability. If that be so, assuming the intention to have been apparent on the instrument, as it is here; it is obvious that the co-surety or co-sureties who executed the instrument must be in a much worse position than the parties originally meant should be the result of their acts. I find, however, that be the weight of that authority what it may, it was cited and commented upon with great care and deliberation in Nicholson v. Revill (2), and ultimately in effect overruled. I

The inference I draw from that decision and from others is that it is now settled law that a release to one of two co-sureties by a creditor is a release to the other.
Counsel for the defendants, however, contended that this was not a case of contract; that you must treat this as the case of creditors' deeds, where, although some creditors do not sign the deed, they may be held capable of taking advantage of its provisions. The real point in Re Semple (3) to which he referred as an authority for that proposition was, that the deed was delivered as an escrow, in which case it would be good at law to take effect as a deed on a given condition. But here the

A question is, what is the effect of this instrument in equity, not at law? It being conceded that the plaintiff here cannot be made liable for the whole amount, the only real question is, as to the moiety? How far is he liable for that? That depends upon the effect of the intention of the parties.

In Underhill v. Horwood (4), LORD ELTON, L.C., said (10 Ves. at pp. 225, 226):

B "I had a notion which, I think, was not correct, that where a man executes a bond, meaning that it should be the joint bond of himself and another, and not his several bond, it would not be his several bond. But the cases go further. In such a case, however, unless there is something special, the man who has become so severally bound has a right to have that bond delivered up; for his intention was not to become a mere several obligee, but to be a joint and several obligee, and the rights are different both at law and equity; for if he is only a several obligee, he has no remedies over against any one; but if he is a joint and several obligee, or only a joint obligee, there is a right of contribution against the other sureties in equity from the earliest times, and of exoneration from the principal."

D When once any doubt as to the legal effect of the instrument is got rid of, it becomes a question of the intention of the parties. What was that intention here? Clearly, as I have said, that there should be a joint and several covenant by the two co-sureties; the deed was prepared by the assurance company, and retained by them and executed by the plaintiff and themselves on that footing. It appears to me also, that the party who procured that execution of the deed—I mean Elton—to be made, must have done so on the understanding that the creditors would tell the plaintiff all the facts connected with the execution of the deed; and that not having been done, I must hold that the original intention of the parties to this indenture ceased to continue when Bradley did not execute it. It is, therefore, impossible for me to hold the plaintiff bound by the deed, even as to a moiety; and, looking at the position of the creditors and the plaintiff, and what has passed between them, I am of opinion that he is entitled to have the deed delivered up to be cancelled, so far as he is concerned; and the decree must be made accordingly, and with costs.

Rolt, Q.C., and Southgate for the plaintiff.

Willcock, Q.C., and Shapter for the defendants.

G KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—The defendants seek to charge the plaintiff with a contract, into which he did not enter. They claim a right to judge and decide for him, that the execution by Mr. Bradley of the instrument in question was a matter of indifference to the plaintiff, except possibly as to a moiety of the debt or demand professed to be constituted by it. The plaintiff, however, was and is entitled to judge and decide upon that for himself and to say effectually (without H proving) that independently of the mere title to contribution as between sureties, he had reasonable grounds for thinking it important to him, and desiring that Mr. Bradley should be associated with him. There has been no judgment at law, and the pendency of the action is, as well as the pleadings in it, at least in a case circumstanced as is the present, immaterial, unless, perhaps, with regard to costs, notwithstanding the stage at which the action was when the bill was filed. But I conceive that in the circumstances of the matter there ought to be no costs at law on either side, that all proceedings in the action should be stayed, that there should be an injunction against suing the plaintiff under the deed, and that the defendants should pay the costs here, including those of the appeal.

TURNER, L.J.—There are two points raised in this case: First, whether having regard to the Common Law Procedure Act the court, supposing the plaintiff to be right on the merits, ought to interfere in his favour; secondly, whether on the merits, the plaintiff ought to be wholly discharged from liability or to be held liable for half the sum secured. With respect to the former of these points, I do not mean to say that in every case in which an equitable defence has been pleaded at law this court will interfere by injunction to restrain proceedings in the action on the ground which has been pleaded at law, but in this case I feel no doubt as to it being the duty of this court to interfere. For really the point to be decided at law on the pleadings, as they stand, is one of common law pleading, and the merits raised by the equitable plea may never be reached. There may be a judgment upon the demurrer at law for the plaintiff at law, on the formal ground that the defendant at law has not pleaded, that he would not have executed the bond had he been aware that it would not be executed by the co-surety. I cannot think that the equitable rights of the plaintiff in equity ought to be disposed of by the result of these pleadings at law.

On the second point, I agree with KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J. Several cases were cited in the argument. I do not think it necessary to discuss them, for I concur in thinking that as the plaintiff entered into the obligation upon the understanding and faith that another person would also enter it, he has a right in equity to be relieved, on the ground that the instrument has not been executed by the intended co-surety.

CAIRNCROSS AND OTHERS v. LORIMER AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Campbell, L.C., Lord Wensleydale and Lord Kingsdown), July 17, August 9, 1860]

[Reported 3 L.T. 190; 7 Jur.N.S. 149; 3 Macq. 827]

Estoppel—Estoppel by conduct—Acquiescence in course of conduct—Later claim to revert to former position.

In 1827 members of a dissenting congregation as trustees acquired some land and built a chapel and buildings thereon which were used by them for the congregation until 1852, when a majority of the congregation, including the minister, resolved to join another dissenting religious body. The union of the two congregations was completed, the minister was admitted a member of the church of the second dissenting body, and the first congregation was declared to belong to it. In 1856 members of the first congregation, who had formed part of the minority, instituted the present suit, declaring themselves to be the only surviving and continuing trustees and asking for a declaration that the chapel and buildings belonged to them and were held for their use and that of such others as adhered to the original doctrine of the first dissenting congregation. They claimed to be entitled to recover the chapel and buildings and to hold them in trust for those purposes.

Held: the members of this minority had, by their conduct in 1852 when they offered no opposition to what was proposed, intimated that they consented to what was done, which could not lawfully have been done without their consent, and, therefore, they were now estopped from maintaining their claim.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Court of Session in an action brought by the appellants praying that it should be found and declared that the appellants, as the "Congregation of United Original Seceders in Carnoustie" had, for themselves and such others as might join them, the sole right to certain property which consisted of land with a place of worship and a dwelling-house thereon.

A dissenting congregation had existed for many years in Carnoustie, called the United Original Seceders. Some of the members, as trustees and managers, in 1827 acquired a piece of ground and built thereon a chapel and buildings, the conveyance being made to the said parties in the following terms:

D "That the said lot of ground and others hereby conveyed, is conveyed to, and shall be held by the said trustees in trust and for behoof of the Associate Congregation of Original Seceders at Carnoustie, to whom solely and those who shall in time coming accede to them, and continue in adherence to the aforesaid original principles of the secession, the said subjects shall belong; and if in future any question at any time shall arise among the members of the said congregation respecting their adherence to the said principles, it shall be determined in favour of those members for the time being who shall be ready to subscribe an affirmative answer to the five first questions of the formula framed and enacted by the Associate Synod of Original Seceders at Edinburgh, May 18, 1827, to be put at the ordination of ministers and elders."

F The congregation continued to use the chapel and ground for the purpose of their form of worship until 1852, when a large majority of the congregation, including the minister, resolved to join another dissenting body, called the Free Church, which was considered to hold substantially the same doctrines. The union was thereafter consummated, and the minister was admitted a member of the Free Church, and the congregation declared to belong to that body of dissenters.

G In 1856 certain persons, members of the original congregation, and who formed part of the minority, instituted the present suit, declaring themselves the only surviving and continuing trustees, and praying to have it declared that the chapel and grounds belonged to and were held for the use of them and such others as adhered to the original doctrine, that the appellants were entitled to recover the buildings, and hold them in trust for these purposes. The respondents pleaded that it was competent for the congregation to join the Free Church, and that the appellants had acquiesced in the proceeding, and were now estopped from complaining. The Court of Session held that the appellants had not objected in due time to the proposed amalgamation with the Free Church, and dismissed the suit, and the appellants brought the present appeal.

Roundell Palmer, Q.C., and Neish for the appellants.

I The Lord Advocate (James Moncrieff) and Anderson, Q.C., for the respondents. Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Aug. 9, 1860. LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., read the following opinion.—In this case I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Session ought to be affirmed.

Counsel for the appellants at your Lordships' Bar contended that this suit was to be treated like an information in the Court of Chancery in England in the name of the Attorney-General for the misapplication of the funds of an endowed charity, arguing that neither consent nor lapse of time could be any bar. Upon this principle, if all the appellants had actually concurred in the union of the Associate Congregation of Carnoustie with the Free Church, and Mr. Meek, the incumbent, having died, they had joined in the election of a successor, according to the rules and discipline of the Free Church, and had applied to the Free Church Presbytery of Arbroath that the object of their choice should be instituted as the new Free Church minister at Carnoustie, they might many years afterwards have commenced a suit to eject him on the ground that he did not belong to the Associate Synod of Original Seceders. We need not now inquire how far this is to be considered an endowed charity (if we had to decide that question I should certainly consider that it is an endowed charity), or what may be the rights under the deed of Oct. 8, 1829, of the Associate Synod of Original Seceders, or of members of that religious persuasion who may hereafter become inhabitants of Carnoustie.

It is enough to observe that the appellants bring this action as individuals for a personal wrong which they individually suffer from the wrongful intrusion of others. Therefore, in this case, first, the maxim will apply, volenti non fit injuria; and secondly, the doctrine will apply which is to be found, I believe, in the laws of all civilised nations, that if a man, either by words or by conduct, has intimated that he consents to an act which has been done, and that he will offer no opposition to it, although it could not have been lawfully done without his consent, and he thereby induces others to do that from which they otherwise might have abstained, he cannot question the legality of the act he had so sanctioned, to the prejudice of those who have so given faith to his words, or to the fair inference to be drawn from his conduct.

Both these defences are set up to the present action. There is strong evidence to support the first, and to show that, according to the rules that govern the proceedings of deliberative assemblies, the union of the Associate Congregation of Seceders at Carnoustie with the Free Church, the appellants being present, was carried nemine dissentiente. But on this point there is some conflicting evidence, and there may be a difference of opinion; and, therefore, I do not make it the reason of my decision. I agree with the Lord Justice Clerk (JOHN INGLIS) and the other judges who thought that "it is not necessary to prove concurrence on the part of the plaintiffs in the proceedings now challenged, and that proof of positive assent or concurrence is not necessary."

I am of opinion that, generally speaking, if a party having an interest to prevent an act being done, has full notice of its having been done, and acquiesces in it, so as to induce a reasonable belief that he consents to it, and the position of others is altered by their giving credit to his sincerity, he has no more right to challenge the act to their prejudice, than he would have had if it had been done by his previous licence.

We are asked what these Scottish judges mean by tempestive or in debito temporis, and, in analogy to the rules of negative or positive prescription, how many years, months, or days constitute debitum temporis. I answer, that it is not to be measured by any cycle of the heavenly bodies, and it must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. The objection must be made before there has been such acquiescence with knowledge as to induce a reasonable belief that the act will not afterwards be challenged. The owner of a mill to which all the lands in a manor are compelled to do suit, if he sees an occupier of land within the manor erecting a grist mill, must not placidly look on till the new mill has been completed and the miller has established a thriving business by laying out all his capital upon it, and then bring an action for damages, praying for an injunction, and that the mill be prostrated as having been illegally erected.

In the present case it was known to the appellants and to all Carnoustie, that on June 3, 1852, there was said to be a vote of the Kirk session for the union, and that on July 6, 1852, the Rev. Mr. Meek had presented himself to the Free Presbytery of Arbroath, and that he had been solemnly admitted as the Free Church

- A minister of the Carnoustie congregation, formerly attached to the Associate Synod of Original Seceders. The present action was not commenced till July, 1856, and for above three years there had not been the slightest complaint by the appellants. On the contrary, one of them had officiated occasionally as leader of the psalmody in the meeting-house at Carnoustie, under the Rev. Mr. Meek, who had become a member of the Free Church Presbytery of Arbroath, and qualified to be moderator of the general assembly of the Free Church of Scotland. If the objection is now made tempestive, so it might be made twenty years hence, and a similar action might then be maintained by one individual who, although he did not actively promote the union, had all along acquiesced in it and professed that he approved of it, while the whole of the Free Church and the whole of the Associate Synod of Original Seceders, except himself, rejoice in the amalgamation.
- C It would be little creditable to the law of Scotland if the confusion and hardship and injustice which must necessarily be the effect of such a proceeding were to meet with judicial sanction. But various authorities were cited (and they might be greatly multiplied) to prove that in Scotland, according to well-recognised principles and unquestioned decisions, such an attempt must fail. I do not consider it at all necessary to refer more particularly to these authorities or to review the
- D analogous class of cases in England, at the head of which stands Pickard v. Sears (1). I confess I should have been sorry if we had been obliged to pronounce a judgment which would have given such facility to the stirring up and the revival of disputes between the different dissenting religious persuasions into which Scotland is unhappily divided; and I feel great satisfaction in being able, according to the well-established principles of Scottish law, to advise your Lordships that this
- E appeal be dismissed with costs.

I ought to mention that my noble and learned friend LORD WENSLEYDALE, who heard this case, dissents from the judgment that I have proposed to your Lordships.

- LORD KINGSDOWN.—Having had an opportunity of seeing and considering the opinion which has just been expressed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, it is unnecessary for me to say more than that I concur both in the conclusion at which he has arrived, and in the principles upon which that conclusion is founded. The question is not what would be the result if the information had been filed in this country by the Attorney-General, or if a similar proceeding had been taken by the Lord Advocate (I do not know whether it is so or not) I regard this as simply a suit instituted by these parties in respect of their own individual interests, and in respect of those interests I think that they are precluded by their own conduct from maintaining this action.

Appeal dismissed.

LYON v. REED AND OTHERS

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Parke, B., and others), April 24, July 6, 1844]

[Reported 13 M. & W. 285; 13 L.J.Ex. 377; 3 L.T.O.S. 302;
8 Jur. 762; 153 E.R. 118]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Surrender—Operation of law—Act by lessee which he is estopped from disputing—Acceptance of new lease from landlord before old lease surrendered.

The surrender of a lease by operation of law occurs where the owner of an estate has been a party to some act the validity of which he is by law afterwards estopped from disputing and which would not be valid if his estate had continued to exist. The law then treats the doing of such an act as amounting to a surrender. Thus, if a lessee for years accepts a new lease from his lessor, he is estopped from saying that his lessor had not power to make the new lease. As the lessor could not grant a new lease until the prior lease had been surrendered, the law says that the acceptance of the new lease constitutes a surrender of the earlier lease. Such a surrender is not the result of intention. It takes place independently, and even in spite, of intention.

Estoppel—Estoppel in pais—Acts in pais—Acts of notoriety, formal and solemn.

Per PARKE, B.: Acts in pais which bind parties by way of estoppel are but few and are all acts which anciently were, and in contemplation of law have continued to be, acts of notoriety, not less formal or solemn than the execution of a deed, such as livery, entry, acceptance of an estate, and the like.

- B Action of debt by the plaintiff, as assignee of the reversion of houses and rope-walks at Shadwell, London, held under a lease from the Dean of St. Paul's, against the defendants, executors of Shakespeare Reed, deceased, in which the plaintiff claimed from the defendants nineteen years' rent, accrued due between Christmas, 1820, and Christmas, 1839, partly in the lifetime of Shakespeare Reed, who held the premises during his life, and partly since his decease, while the premises were in the possession of the defendants, his executors.
- C The premises in question were part of the property of the Dean of St. Paul's, who, on Dec. 26, 1803, demised a large estate at Shadwell, including the houses and premises in question, to two persons named Ord and Planta (who were trustees for the Bowes family) for a term of forty years commencing at Christmas, 1803, which would, therefore, expire at Christmas, 1843. On Mar. 24, 1808, Ord and
- D Planta granted an underlease of the houses and rope-walks in question to Shakespeare Reed for thirty-four years, commencing from Christmas, 1807, so that the term created by this underlease would expire at Christmas, 1841, leaving a reversion of two years in Ord and Planta. The rent sought to be recovered was the rent which accrued due on the underlease between Christmas, 1820, and Christmas, 1839. Previously to the month of October, 1811, Robert Hartshorn Barber and
- E Francis Charles Parry were appointed by the Court of Chancery trustees for the Bowes family in the place of Ord and Planta, and by an indenture dated Oct. 3, 1811, endorsed on the lease of 1803, all the property at Shadwell demised by that lease was assigned by Ord and Planta to Barber and Parry, the new trustees. Soon after this assignment, the Bowes family negotiated with the dean for a renewal of the lease of 1803, and, accordingly, a new lease was executed by the
- F dean, dated April 7, 1812, for a term of forty years from Christmas, 1811, which term would, therefore, endure till Christmas, 1851. In error this lease, instead of being made to Barber and Parry (the new trustees) in whom the old term (subject to the underlease to Reed) was vested, was made to Ord and Planta, the old trustees, the fact of the change of trustees, and the assignment of Oct. 3, 1811, having at the time escaped observation. On July, 1812, a private Act of Parlia-
- G ment was passed, enabling the dean and his successor for the time being, on a surrender of the existing lease, to grant leases of the Shadwell estate to the trustees of the Bowes family for successive terms of ninety-nine years, renewable for ever. In pursuance of this Act (which recited that Ord and Planta wished to be discharged from their trust and that John Osborn and John Burt had agreed to act as trustees in their place), by an indenture dated Aug. 31, 1812, and made between the dean,
- H of the first part, Thomas Bowes (the life tenant), of the second part, and Osborn and Burt, of the third part, the dean demised the Shadwell property to Osborn and Burt for a term of ninety-nine years. The demise was expressed to be made as well in consideration of the surrender of the lease of April 7, 1812, "being the lease last existing," as also of the rents and covenants, etc.
- I At some time before January, 1814, Mr. Bowes, and Osborn and Burt, his trustees, discovered the mistake, mentioned in the recital, into which they had fallen, and two further deeds were executed to cure the defect. By the former of these deeds, dated Jan. 6, 1814, and made between Barber and Parry, of the one part, and the dean, of the other part, reciting that, at the time of the granting of the lease of April 7, 1812, the estate and interest created by the original demise of Dec. 20, 1803, was vested in Barber and Parry, and also reciting that the fact of the assignment to them by the deed of Oct. 3, 1811, was not known to the parties by whom the private Act was solicited, it was witnessed that Barber and Parry did bargain, sell, and surrender to the dean the whole of the Shadwell estate to the intent that the term of forty years, created by the lease of Dec. 26, 1803, might be merged in the freehold, and that the dean might execute a new lease to Osborn and Burt according to the private Act. By the other deed, dated Jan. 29, 1814, and made between the dean, of the first part, Thomas Bowes, of the second part, and Osborn and Burt, of the third part, the dean, in consideration of the effectual surrender of the two prior leases of Dec. 26, 1803, and April 7, 1812, and for the other considerations therein mentioned, demised the Shadwell estate to Osborn and Burt, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for a term of ninety-nine years. The interest of Osborn and Burt, under these two leases to them, by various assignments dated before Christmas, 1820, became vested in the plaintiff who, therefore, was entitled to recover the rent in question in this action if Osborn and Burt would have been so entitled.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 6, 1844. PARKE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court. Such being the principal facts, we must consider how they bear on the several issues raised by the pleadings. The declaration, after stating the demise from the dean to Ord and Planta in 1803, and the underlease from them to Reed in 1808, goes on to state, that, by the deed of Oct. 3, 1811, Ord and Planta assigned all their interest in the premises to Barber and Parry, and that the dean, being seised of the reversion expectant on the term of forty years so assigned to Barber and Parry, by the indenture of Aug. 31, 1812, demised the premises to Osborn and Burt for a term of ninety-nine years, by virtue whereof they became entitled to the reversion for that term. The declaration then goes on to state that, by the indenture of Jan. 6, 1814, Barber and Parry assigned their interest to the dean, to the intent that he might grant a new lease to Osborn and Burt, and that afterwards, on Jan. 29, 1814, the dean, by the indenture of that date, made a new demise of the premises to Osborn and Burt for a fresh term of ninety-nine years, they by the same indenture surrendering the former term created by the demise of Aug. 31, 1812. The declaration then traces the title in the present plaintiff by assignment from Osborn and Burt previously to Christmas, 1820, and so claims title to the rent accrued due after that date.

To this declaration the defendants pleaded six pleas: First, a plea traversing the averment that, at the time of the demise to Osborn and Burt of Aug. 31, 1812, the dean was seised in fee of the reversion. Secondly, a plea traversing that demise. Thirdly, a plea traversing the assignment by Barber and Parry to the dean, to the intent that he might grant a new lease to Osborn and Burt. Fourthly, a plea traversing the surrender by Osborn and Burt of the first term of ninety-nine years. Fifthly, a special plea stating the indenture of April 7, 1812, whereby Ord and Planta became entitled to the reversion for forty years from Christmas, 1811, and so continued until, up to, and after the execution of the indenture of Jan. 29, 1814. Sixthly, a plea traversing the demise to Osborn and Burt by the indenture of Jan. 29, 1814.

Issue was joined on all the pleas except the fifth, and to that the plaintiff replied, that, after the making of the lease of April 7, 1812, and before the lease of Aug. 31, 1812, the private Act of Parliament was passed, authorising the dean, on the surrender of the existing lease, to grant a lease for ninety-nine years to Osborn and Burt, and the replication then averred that the lease of Aug. 31, 1812, was duly made in pursuance of the Act, and that, at the time when it was made, the lease of April 7, 1812, was duly surrendered. To this the defendants rejoined, traversing the surrender of the lease of April 7, 1812, and on this issue was joined.

The second, third, and sixth issues, it will be observed, are mere traverses of the execution of deeds which have been found to have been duly executed, and, as the traverse merely puts in issue the fact of the execution, and not the validity of the deeds or the competency of the parties to make them, the verdict on those

- A issues must certainly be entered for the plaintiff. So must that on the fourth issue, whereby the defendant traverses the surrender by Osborn and Burt of the first term of ninety-nine years, when the demise of the second term was made to them. It is quite clear that the acceptance of the second demise was of itself a surrender in law of the first, even if no surrender in fact was made. For whom, then, is the verdict on the remaining issues, the first and fifth, to be entered? The issue on
- B the fifth plea is, it will be observed, whether the lease of April 7, 1812, was duly surrendered at the time of the making of the indenture of Aug. 31, 1812. And the issue on the first plea is substantially the same, for if the plaintiff succeeds in showing that the indenture of April 7, 1812, was duly surrendered as set forth in his declaration, then it follows that the dean was at that time seised of the reversion, and so the plaintiff must succeed on the first issue; if, on the other hand, he
- C fail on the fifth issue, he must also fail on the first.

The real question for our consideration is whether the plaintiff has succeeded in showing that the term of April 7, 1812, was surrendered previously to the execution of the indenture of Aug. 31, 1812. It was argued by counsel for the plaintiff, first, that the circumstances of the case warranted the conclusion that there was an actual surrender in fact, and, if that be not so, then, secondly, that they prove

D conclusively a surrender in point of law.

- We will consider each of these propositions separately. First, as to a surrender in fact. The subject-matter of the lease of April 7, 1812, was, it must be observed, a reversion; a matter, therefore, lying in grant, and not in livery, and of which, therefore, there could be no valid surrender in fact otherwise than by deed; and what the plaintiff must make out, therefore, on this part of his case is, that,
- E before the execution of the first lease for ninety-nine years, Ord and Planta, by some deed not now forthcoming, assigned or surrendered to the dean the interest which they had acquired under the lease of April 7. But what is there to warrant us in holding that any such deed was ever executed? Prima facie a person setting up a deed in support of his title is bound to produce it. But undoubtedly this general obligation admits of many exceptions. Where there has been long enjoyment of any right, which could have had no lawful origin except by deed, then, in
- F favour of such enjoyment, all necessary deeds may be presumed, if there is nothing to negative such presumption. Has there, then, in this case, been any such enjoyment as may render it unnecessary to show the deed on which it has been founded? The only fact as to enjoyment stated in this case has precisely an opposite tendency; it is stated, so far as relates to the property, the rent of which
- G forms the subject of this action, namely the houses, etc., underlet to Reed, that no rent has ever been paid; and, therefore, as to that portion of the property included in the lease of April, 1812, there has certainly been no enjoyment inconsistent with the hypothesis that that lease was not surrendered.

- The circumstances on which the plaintiff mainly relies as establishing the fact of a surrender by deed, are the statements in the two leases to Osborn and Burt,
- H that they were made in consideration, inter alia, of the surrender of the lease of April 7, and the fact of that lease being found among the dean's instruments of title. These circumstances, however, appear to us to be entitled to very little weight. The ordinary course pursued on the renewal of a lease is for the lessee to deliver up the old lease on receiving the new one, and the new lease usually states that it is made in consideration of the surrender of the old one. No surrender by deed is necessary, where, as is commonly the case, the former lessee takes
- I the new lease, and all which is ordinarily done to warrant the statement of the surrender of the old lease as part of the consideration for granting the new one is that the old lease itself, the parchment on which it is engrossed, is delivered up. Such surrender affords strong evidence that the new lease has been accepted by the old tenant, and such acceptance undoubtedly operates as a surrender by operation of law, and so both parties get all which they require. We collect from the documents that this was the course pursued on occasion of making the lease of Dec. 26, 1803, and the lease of April 7, 1812; and we see nothing whatever to warrant the conclusion that anything else was done on occasion of making the lease to Osborn and Burt. A

Where a surrender by deed was understood by the parties to be necessary, as it was with reference to the term assigned to Barber and Parry, there it was regularly made, and the deed of surrender was endorsed on the lease itself. There is no reason for supposing that the same course would not have been pursued as to the lease of April, 1812, if the parties had considered it necessary. If any surrender had been made, no doubt the deed would have been found with the other muniments of title. No such deed of surrender is forthcoming, and we see nothing to justify us in presuming that any such deed ever existed. We may add, that the statement in the new lease, that the old one had been surrendered, cannot certainly of itself afford any evidence against the present defendants, who are altogether strangers to the deed in which those statements occur. B

It remains to consider whether, although there may have been no surrender in fact, the circumstances of the case will warrant us in holding that there was a surrender by act and operation of law. On the part of the plaintiff it is contended that there is sufficient to justify us in coming to such a conclusion, for, it is said, the fact of the lease of April 7, 1812, being found in the possession of the dean, even if it does not go the length of establishing a surrender by deed, yet furnishes very strong evidence to show that the new lease granted to Osborn and Burt was made with the consent of Ord and Planta, the lessees under the deed of April 7, 1812. This, it is contended, on the authority of Thomas v. Cook (1), and Walker v. Richardson (2), is sufficient to cause a surrender by operation of law. C

To ascertain how far those two cases can be relied on as authorities we must consider what is meant by a surrender by operation of law. This term is applied to cases where the owner of a particular estate has been a party to some act the validity of which he is by law afterwards estopped from disputing, and which would not be valid if his particular estate had continued to exist. There the law treats the doing of such act as amounting to a surrender. Thus, if a lessee for years accepts a new lease from his lessor, he is estopped from saying that his lessor had not power to make the new lease; and, as the lessor could not do this until the prior lease had been surrendered, the law says that the acceptance of the new lease is of itself a surrender of the former. So, if there be tenant for life, remainder to another in fee, and the remainderman comes on the land and makes a feoffment to the tenant for life, who accepts livery thereon, the tenant for life is thereby estopped from disputing the seisin in fee of the remainderman, and so the law says, that such acceptance of livery amounts to a surrender of his life estate. Again, if tenant for years accepts from his lessor a grant of a rent issuing out of the land and payable during the term, he is thereby estopped from disputing his lessor's right to grant the rent, and as this could not be done during his term, therefore, he is deemed in law to have surrendered his term to the lessor. D

It is needless to multiply examples. All the old cases will be found to depend on the principle to which we have adverted, namely, an act done by or to the owner of a particular estate, the validity of which he is estopped from disputing, and which could not have been done if the particular estate continued to exist. The law there says that the act itself amounts to a surrender. In such case it will be observed there can be no question of intention. The surrender is not the result of intention. It takes place independently, and even in spite, of intention. Thus, in the case which we have adverted to of a lessee taking a second lease from the lessor, or a tenant for life accepting a feoffment from the party in remainder, or a lessee accepting a rent-charge from his lessor, it would not at all alter the case to show that there was no intention to surrender the particular estate, or even that there was an express intention to keep it unsurrendered. In all these cases the surrender would be the act of the law, and would prevail in spite of the intention of the parties. These principles are all clearly deducible from the cases and doctrine laid down in ROLLE and collected in VINER'S ABRIDGMENT, tit. "Surrender," F. and G., and in COMYNS' DIGEST, tit. "Surrender," T. and I. 2, and E

A the authorities there referred to. But in all these cases, it is to be observed, the owner of the particular estate, by granting or accepting an estate or interest, is a party to the act which operates as a surrender. That he agrees to an act done by the reversioner is not sufficient. BROOKE, in his ABRIDGMENT, tit. "Surrender," pl. 48, questions the doctrine of FROWYK, C.J., who says: "If a termor agrees that the reversioner shall make a feoffment to a stranger, this is a surrender," and B he says he believes it is not law; and the contrary was expressly decided in Swift v. Heath (3), where it was held, that the consent of the tenant for life to the remainderman making a feoffment to a stranger did not amount to a surrender of the estate for life, and to the same effect are the authorities in VINER'S ABRIDGEMENT, "Surrender," F. 3 and 4.

C If we apply these principles to the case now before us, it will be seen that they do not at all warrant the conclusion, that there was a surrender of the lease of April 7, 1812, by act and operation of law. Even adopting, as we do, the argument of the plaintiff that the delivery up by Ord and Planta of the lease in question affords cogent evidence of their having consented to the making of the new lease, still there is no estoppel in such a case. It is an act which, like any other ordinary act in pais, is capable of being explained, and its effect must, therefore, depend, not D on any legal consequence necessarily attaching on and arising out of the act itself, but on the intention of the parties. Before the Statute of Frauds the tenant in possession of a corporeal hereditament might surrender his term by parol, and, therefore, the circumstance of his delivering up his lease to the lessor might afford strong evidence of a surrender in fact, but it certainly could not, on the principles E which does not depend on intention at all. On all these grounds, we are of opinion that there was in this case no surrender by operation of law, and we should have considered the case as quite clear had it not been for some modern cases, to which we must now advert.

The first case, we believe, in which any intimation is given that there could be a surrender by act and operation of law by a demise from the reversioner to a stranger with the consent of the lessee is that of Stone v. Whiting (4), in which F HOLROYD, J., intimates his opinion that there could, but there was no decision and he reserved the point. This was followed soon afterwards by Thomas v. Cook (1). That was an action of debt by a landlord against his tenant from year to year under a parol demise. The defence was that the defendant Cook, the tenant, had put another person (Parkes) in possession, and that Thomas, the plaintiff, had, with the assent of Cook, the defendant, accepted Parkes as his tenant, and that G so the tenancy of Cook had been determined. The Court of King's Bench held that the tenancy was determined by act and operation of law. It is matter of great regret that a case involving a question of so much importance and nicety, should have been decided by refusing a motion for a new trial. Had the case been put into a train for more solemn argument, we cannot but think that many considerations might have been suggested which would have led the court to pause H before they came to the decision at which they arrived. BAYLEY, J., in his judgment says that the jury were right in finding that the original tenant assented, because, he says, it was clearly for his benefit, an observation which forcibly shows the uncertainty which the doctrine is calculated to create.

I The acts in pais which bind parties by way of estoppel are but few, and are pointed out by LORD COKE (Co. Litt. 352 a). They are all acts which anciently really were, and in contemplation of law have always continued to be, acts of notoriety, not less formal and solemn than the execution of a deed, such as livery, entry, acceptance of an estate, and the like. Whether a party had or had not concurred in an act of this sort was deemed a matter which there could be no difficulty in ascertaining, and then the legal consequences followed. But in what uncertainty and peril will titles be placed if they are liable to be affected by such accidents as those alluded to by BAYLEY, J. If the doctrine of Thomas v. Cook (1) should be extended, it may very much affect titles to long terms of years--mortgage terms, for instance, in which it frequently happens that there is a consent, express or implied, by the legal termor to a demise from the mortgagor to a third person. To hold that such a transaction could, under any circumstances, amount to a surrender by operation of law, would be attended with most serious consequences. A

Thomas v. Cook (1) has been followed by other cases, and acted upon to a considerable extent. Whatever doubt, therefore, we might feel as to the propriety of the decision that in such a case there was a surrender by act and operation of law we should probably not have felt ourselves justified in overruling it. Perhaps the case itself and others of the same description might be supported upon the ground of the actual occupation by the landlord's new tenants, which would have the effect of eviction by the landlord himself in superseding the rent or compensation for use and occupation during the continuance of that occupation. But we feel fully warranted in not extending the doctrine of that case, which is open to so much doubt, especially as such a course might be attended with very mischievous consequences to the security of titles. B C

If, in compliance with these cases, we hold that there is a surrender by act and operation of law where the estates dealt with are corporeal and in possession, of which demises may, therefore, be made by parol or writing, and where there is an open and notorious shifting of the actual possession, it does not follow that we should adopt the same doctrine where reversions or incorporeal hereditaments are disposed of which pass only by deed. With respect to these, we think we ought to abide by the ancient rules of the common law, which have not been broken in upon by any modern decision, for that of Walker v. Richardson (2), which has been much relied on in argument, is not to be considered as any authority in this respect, inasmuch as the distinction that the right to tolls lay in grant was never urged, and probably could not have been with success, as the leases, perhaps, passed the interest in the soil itself. Moreover, according to the report of that case, it would seem that the new lessees had, before they accepted their lease, become entitled to the old lease by an actual assignment from the old lessee. If this were so, then there could, of course, be no doubt but that the old lease was destroyed by the grant and acceptance of the new one. It is, however, right to say, that we believe this statement to have crept into the report inadvertently, and that there was not, in fact, any such assignment. D E F

The result of our anxious consideration of this case is that the verdict on the issues on the first plea and on the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea, must be entered for the defendants, and as those pleas go to the whole cause of action, the judgment must be for them. G

FREEMAN AND ANOTHER v. COOKE

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Parke, Alderson, Rolfe and Platt, BB.), June 22, 26, July 11, 1848]

[Reported 2 Exch. 654; 6 Dow. & L. 187; 18 L.J.Ex. 114;
12 L.T.O.S. 66; 12 Jur. 777; 154 E.R. 652]

Estoppel—Estoppel by representation—False representation that goods belonged to another—Seizure of goods under writ of fi. fa. against that other—True owner not estopped from complaining of wrongful seizure.

Prior to his bankruptcy and in anticipation of a distress W. removed his goods first to the house of his brother J. and later to that of his brother B. When the sheriff's officers entered B.'s house, W. told them that the goods belonged to B., then that they belonged to J., and finally that they were his own. The goods were seized under a writ of fi. fa. against B. and were sold in the name of B. In an action of trover by the assignees of the bankrupt W. against the sheriff for conversion of the goods, the jury found that the goods belonged to W. and that W. represented to the officers that the goods were those of B., so inducing them, by that false representation, to seize the goods.

D

Held: the finding of the jury did not estop the bankrupt W. and the plaintiffs, his assignees, from complaining of the seizure of the goods as their own.

Estoppel—Pleading—Estoppel by record and deed—Estoppel in pais.

E

Per Curiam: (i) Estoppels by record and by deed must, in order to make them binding, be pleaded, if there is an opportunity, otherwise the party omitting to plead waives the estoppel and leaves the cause at large, on which the jury may find according to the truth; (ii) with respect to estoppels in pais, in certain cases they need not be pleaded in order to make them obligatory: e.g., where a man represents another as his agent in order to procure a person to contract with him as such, and he does contract, the contract binds the principal in the same manner as if he had made it himself; it is his contract in point of law, and no form of pleading could leave such a matter at large and enable the jury to treat it as no contract. The same rule appears to apply to all similar estoppels in pais.

Estoppel—Estoppel by representation—Wilfully causing another to believe certain fact—Negligently or culpably standing by—"Wilfully"—Intention that representation be acted on.

H

Per Curiam: Where one, by his words or conduct, "wilfully" causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things and induces him to act on that belief or to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time. More broadly, a party who negligently or culpably stands by and allows another to contract on the faith of a fact which he can contradict cannot afterwards dispute that fact in an action against the person whom he has himself assisted in deceiving. The term "wilfully" in the rule must be understood to mean that, if not that the party represents that to be true which he knows to be untrue, at least, that he means his representation to be acted upon and that it is acted upon accordingly.

Estoppel—Estoppel by conduct—Inference by reasonable man that representation be true—Belief that he was meant to act thereon.

Estoppel—Estoppel by conduct—Negligence or omission where duty to disclose truth.

Whatever a man's real intention may be, if he so conducts himself that a reasonable person would take a representation made by the man to be true and believe that it was meant that he should act on it, and he does act on it as true, the party making the representation is precluded from contesting its truth; and conduct, by negligence or omission, where there is a duty cast on a person, by usage or trade or otherwise, to disclose the truth, may often have the same effect. A

Rule Nisi to enter a verdict for the defendant in an action of trover against the defendant for conversion of a bankrupt's goods seized before the bankruptcy under a writ of fi. fa. against the bankrupt's two brothers. The defendant pleaded not guilty, not possessed and leave and license. The plaintiffs joined issue on the first two pleas and traversed the third and issue was joined on the traverse.

The plaintiffs were the assignees of the bankrupt, William Broadbent, and the defendant was the sheriff of Yorkshire. Prior to the bankruptcy, William Broadbent, in anticipation of a distress, had removed his goods to the house of his brother

Joseph and afterwards to the house of his brother Benjamin. When the sheriff's officers entered Benjamin's house, William told them that the goods belonged to his brother Benjamin, supposing that they had no writ against Benjamin and that the writ was against him. When the writ was produced and it was found to be against Benjamin, William told the officers that the goods belonged to another brother, Joseph. Finally, he said that the goods were his own. The goods were seized and sold as those of Benjamin. The defendant contended that the statements and conduct of William operated as conclusive evidence against him that the goods were not his at the time of the conversion and that the plaintiffs were also bound. A

At the trial before ALDERSON, B., at the Liverpool Assizes, the jury found that the goods were, in fact, William's and also "that William represented the goods to the sheriff's officers as the goods of Benjamin, so as to induce them, by that false representation to seize the goods." The judge directed a verdict for the plaintiffs, with leave reserved to the defendant to move to enter verdict in his favour on any of the issues. The defendant obtained the rule already mentioned. C

Watson, Atherton and H. Hill showed cause against the rule.

Knowles and Hall supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult. D

July 11, 1848. PARKE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—In this case, which was argued before ALDERSON, ROLFE and PLATT, BB., and myself, at the sittings after the last term, we are all of opinion that the rule ought to be discharged.

It was an action of trover by the assignees of William Broadbent against the sheriff of Yorkshire for goods of the bankrupt. There were pleas of not guilty, not possessed, and leave and license. The conversion was the seizure of the goods by the defendant's officers, under a fi. fa. against Joseph and Benjamin Broadbent. It appeared, that, when the officers entered, the bankrupt told them the goods seized were the property of Benjamin; he did so, supposing that they had no writ against Benjamin. Afterwards he contradicted that statement, and said they were the goods of his brother Joseph. It was contended, that this representation bound William, because it induced the officers to seize; and that he could not complain of that act, nor could the assignees who claimed under him. ALDERSON, B., left a question to the jury upon this part of the case, the finding on which he reserved for the consideration of the court, giving leave to enter a verdict for the defendants on the issue on the plea of Not Possessed. The jury found, that the goods were really William's; but they also found E

"that William represented the goods to the sheriff's officer as the goods of Benjamin, so as to induce him, by that false representation, to seize them"; and the question is whether this finding is sufficient to estop the bankrupt and the plaintiffs as assignees, from complaining of the seizure of these goods as their own? H

The case was very fully argued before us, and many questions discussed on the law of estoppels, on which it is unnecessary to give an opinion. It is certain that estoppels by record and by deed must, in order to make them binding, be pleaded, if there be an opportunity, otherwise the party omitting to plead it waives the estoppel, and leaves the cause at large, on which the jury may find according to the truth: Trevivian v. Lawrence (1); Magrath v. Hardy (2). With respect to estoppels in pais, in certain cases there is no doubt they need not be pleaded in order to make them obligatory. For instance, where a man represents another as his agent in order to procure a person to contract with him as such, and he does contract, the contract binds in the same manner as if he made it himself, and is his contract in point of law; and no form of pleading could leave such a matter at large, and enable the jury to treat it as no contract. The same rule appears to apply to all similar estoppels in pais, as the editor of Wms. SAUND., Vol. 1, at p. 326, n. 2, expresses his opinion. The estoppel, therefore, if it be one created I

A by the conduct of the bankrupt in this case, is not opened by the omission to plead it, and the only question is whether it be an estoppel.

It is contended that it was, upon the authority of the rule laid down in Pickard v. Sears (3). That rule is (6 Ad. & El. at p. 474):

B "that, where one, by his words or conduct, wilfully causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief, or to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time."

C That was founded on previous authorities, in Graves v. Key (4) and Heane v. Rogers (5), and has been acted upon in some cases since. The principle is stated more broadly by LORD DENMAN, C.J., in Gregg v. Wells (6), where his Lordship says (10 Ad. & El. at p. 98):

"A party who negligently or culpably stands by and allows another to contract on the faith of a fact which he can contradict, cannot afterwards dispute that fact in an action against the person whom he has himself assisted in deceiving."

D Whether that rule has been correctly acted upon by the jury in all the reported cases in which it has been applied, is not now the question; but the proposition contained in the rule itself, as above laid down in Pickard v. Sears (3), must be considered as established.

E By the term "wilfully," however, in that rule, we must understand, if not that the party represents that to be true which he knows to be untrue, at least, that he means his representation to be acted upon, and that it is acted upon accordingly; and if, whatever a man's real intention may be, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe that it was meant that he should act upon it, and did act upon it as true, the party making the representation would be equally precluded from contesting its truth; and conduct, by negligence or omission, where there is a duty cast upon a person, by usage of trade or otherwise, to disclose the truth, may often have the same effect. As,

F for instance, a retiring partner omitting to inform his customers of the fact, in the usual mode, that the continuing partners were no longer authorised to act as his agents, is bound by all contracts made by them with third persons, on the faith of their being so authorised.

G But if we apply this rule, either in the terms in which it is enunciated in Pickard v. Sears (3), or as it is above expounded, the finding of the jury is insufficient to entitle the defendant to have a verdict entered for him on the plea of Not Possessed. It is not found that he intended to induce the officer to seize the goods as those of Benjamin; and, whatever intention he had on his first statement, was done away with by an opposite statement before the seizure took place. Nor can it be said that any reasonable man would have seized the goods on the faith of the bankrupt's representation, taken altogether. In truth, in most cases to which the doctrine in

H Pickard v. Sears (3) is to be applied, the representation is such as to amount to the contract or licence of the party making it. Here there is no pretence for saying it amounted to a licence, and a contract is out of the question. We, therefore, think that the rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

WOOD v. LEADBITTER

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Pollock, C.B., Alderson and Rolfe, BB.), January 17, 18, 21, February 22, 1845]

[Reported 13 M. & W. 838; 14 L.J.Ex. 161; 4 L.T.O.S. 433;
9 J.P. 312; 9 Jur. 187; 153 E.R. 351]

Real Property—Incorporeal hereditament—Affecting land—Easement—Grant—Transfer—Need to be by deed.

No incorporeal hereditament affecting land, e.g., a right of common or a right of way, can be created or transferred otherwise than by deed.

Licence—Revocation—Parol licence affecting use of land—Revocation without return of money paid for it—Effect of coupling with grant.

A parol licence affecting the use of land is revocable by one party at any time and without repayment of money which has been paid for it unless it is coupled with a grant of a nature capable of being made by parol. Where the licence is coupled with a grant of something incapable of being granted otherwise than by deed it is a mere licence and revocable.

Semble: A mere licence, though under seal, is revocable.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22, 1845. ALDERSON, B., delivered the following judgment of the Court.—This was an action for an assault and false imprisonment. The plea (upon which alone any question arose) was that at the time of the alleged trespass the plaintiff was in a certain close of Lord Eglinton's, and the defendant, as the servant of Lord Eglinton, and by his command, laid his hands upon the plaintiff in order to remove him from the said close, using no unnecessary violence. The replication was that at the time of such refusal the plaintiff was in the close by the leave and licence of Lord Eglinton. The leave and licence was traversed by the defendant, and issue was joined on that traverse.

- F On the trial, it appeared that the place from which the plaintiff was removed by the defendant was the inclosure attached to and surrounding the Great Stand on the Doncaster Racecourse; that Lord Eglinton was steward of the races there in the year 1843; and that tickets were sold in the town of Doncaster at one guinea each, which were understood to entitle the holders to come into the stand and the inclosure surrounding it, and to remain there every day during the races. These tickets were not sealed, nor were they signed by Lord Eglinton, but it must be assumed they were issued with his privity. It further appeared that the plaintiff, having purchased one of these tickets, came to the stand during the races of the year 1843, and was there or in the inclosure while the races were going on. While there, and during the races, the defendant, by the order of Lord Eglinton, desired him to depart, and gave him notice that if he did not go away force would be used to turn him out. It must be assumed that the plaintiff had in no respect misconducted himself, and that if he had not been requested to depart, his coming upon and remaining in the inclosure would have been an act justified by his purchase of the ticket. The plaintiff refused to go, and thereupon the defendant, by the order of Lord Eglinton, forced him out, using no unnecessary violence.

- I ROLFE, B., who tried the case, in directing the jury, told them that, assuming the ticket to have been sold to the plaintiff under the sanction of Lord Eglinton, still it was lawful for Lord Eglinton, without returning the guinea and without assigning any reason for what he did, to order the plaintiff to quit the inclosure; and that if they, the jury, were satisfied that notice was given to the plaintiff requiring him to quit the ground, and that before he was forcibly removed by the defendant a reasonable time had elapsed during which he might have conveniently gone away, then the plaintiff was not, at the time of the removal, on the place in question by the leave and licence of Lord Eglinton. On this direction the jury found a verdict for the defendant. In last Michaelmas Term counsel for the plaintiff obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict for misdirection, on the ground A that, under the circumstances, Lord Eglinton must be taken to have given the plaintiff leave to come into and remain in the inclosure during the races; that such leave was not revocable, at all events, without returning the guinea; and so, at the time of removal, the plaintiff was in the inclosure by the leave and licence of Lord Eglinton. Cause was shown during last Term, and the question was argued before my Lord Chief Baron, ROLFE, B., and myself, and on account of the B conflicting authorities cited in the argument we took time to consider our judgment, which we are now prepared to deliver.

That no incorporeal inheritance affecting land can either be created or transferred otherwise than by deed is a proposition so well established that it would be mere pedantry to cite authorities in its support. All such inheritances are said emphatically to lie in grant, and not in livery, and not to pass by the mere delivering C of the deed. In all the authorities and textbooks upon the subject a deed is always stated or assumed to be indispensably requisite, and, though the older textbooks speak of incorporeal inheritances, yet there is no doubt but that the principle does not depend on the quantity of interest granted or transferred, but on the nature of the subject-matter. A right of common, for instance, which is a profit à prendre, or a right of way, which is an easement, a right in nature of an D easement, can no more be granted or conveyed for life or for years without a deed than in fee-simple.

In the present case, the right claimed by the plaintiff is a right during a portion of each day, for a limited number of days, to pass into and through, and to remain on, a certain close belonging to Lord Eglinton—to go and remain where, if he went, he would, but for the ticket, be a trespasser. This is a right affecting land, at E least as obviously and extensively as a right of way over the land; it is a right of way, and something more, and if we had to decide this case on general principles only, and independently of authority, it would appear to us perfectly clear that no such right could be created otherwise than by deed. The plaintiff, however, in this case, argues that he is not driven to claim the right in question strictly as grantee. He contends that, without any grant from Lord Eglinton, he had licence F from him to be in the close in question at the time when he was turned out, and that such a licence was, under the circumstances, irrevocable. For this he relies mainly upon four cases, which he considers to be expressly in point for him, viz., Webb v. Paternoster (1); Wood v. Lake (2); Taylor v. Waters (3); and Wood v.
Manley (4).

As the argument of the plaintiff rested almost entirely on the authority of these G four cases, it is very important to look to them minutely, in order to see the exact points they severally decided. Before, however, we proceed to this investigation, it may be convenient to consider the nature of a licence, and what are its legal incidents, and for this purpose we cannot do better than refer to the elaborate judgment of VAUGHAN, C.J., in Thomas v. Sorrell (5), as it appears in his reports. The question there was as to the right of the Crown to dispense with certain statutes H regulating the sale of wine, and to license the Vintner's Company to do certain acts, notwithstanding these statutes. In the course of his judgment the Chief Justice says (Vaugh. at p. 351):

"A dispensation or licence properly passeth no interest, nor alters or transfers property in any thing, but only makes an action lawful which, without it, had been unlawful, as a licence to hunt in a man's park or to come into his house are only actions which without licence had been unlawful, but a licence to hunt in a man's park and carry away the deer killed to his own use, to cut down a tree in a man's ground and to carry it away the next day after to his own use, are licences as to the acts of hunting and cutting down the trees, but as to the carrying away the deer killed and the tree cut down, they are grants. So to license a man to eat my meat, or to fire the wood in my chimney to warm him by, as to the actions of eating, firing my wood and warning him, they are I

A licences, but it is consequent necessarily to those actions that my property be destroyed in the meat eaten and in the wood burnt. So as in some cases by consequent, and not directly, and has its effect; a dispensation or licence may destroy and alter the property."

B Attending to this passage in conjunction with the title LICENCE in BROOK'S ABRIDGMENT, from which, and particularly from para. 15, it appears that a licence is in its nature revocable, we have before us the whole principle of the law on this subject. A mere licence is revocable, but that which is called a licence is often something more than a licence. It often comprises or is connected with a grant, and then the party who has given it cannot in general revoke it so as to defeat his grant to which it was incident. It may further be observed, that a licence under seal (provided it be a mere licence) is as revocable as a licence by parol, and, on the other hand, a licence by parol coupled with a grant, is as irrevocable as a licence by deed, provided only that the grant is of a nature capable of being made by parol; but where there is a licence by parol coupled with a parol grant, or pretended grant, of something which is incapable of being granted otherwise than by deed, there the licence is a mere licence, it is not an incident to a valid grant, D and it is, therefore, revocable. Thus a licence by A. to hunt in his park, whether given by deed or by parol, is revocable. It merely renders the act of hunting lawful, which, without the licence, would have been unlawful. If the licence be, as put by VAUGHAN, C.J., a licence not only to hunt, but also to take away the deer when killed to his own use, this is in truth a grant of the deer with the licence annexed to come on the land; and supposing the grant of the deer to be good, E then the licence would be irrevocable by the party who had given it. He would be estopped from defeating his own grant or act in nature of a grant. But supposing the case of a parol licence to come on any land, and there to make a watercourse to flow on to the land of the licence; in such a case there is no valid grant of the watercourse, and the licence remains a mere licence, and, therefore, capable of being revoked. On the other hand, if such a licence were granted by deed, there F the question would be on the construction of the deed, whether it amounted to a grant of the watercourse, and, if it did, then the licence would be irrevocable.

G Having premised these remarks on the general doctrine, we will proceed to consider the four cases relied on by the plaintiff. The first was Webb v. Paternoster (1). That, as appears from the report in ROLLE, was an action in trespass, brought against the defendant for eating by the mouth of his cattle the plaintiff's hay. The defendant justified under Sir William Plummer, the owner of the fee of the close in which the hay was, averring that Sir William Plummer leased the close to him, and, therefore, as lessee, he turned his cattle into the close, and they ate the hay. The plaintiff replied that, before the making of the lease, Sir William Plummer had licensed him to place the hay on the close till he could conveniently sell it, and that before he could conveniently sell it, Sir William Plummer leased H the land to the defendant. The defendant demurred to the replication. From the arguments as given in ROLLE, it appears that the plaintiff's counsel, who was first heard, contended, first, that the plaintiff's licence being a licence for profit, and not merely for pleasure, and being also for a certain time only, namely, till he could sell his hay, was not revocable; and, secondly, if the licence was revocable, still that the lease to the defendant was an implied and not an express revocation, I and, therefore, was inoperative against him without notice. For this he referred to Mallory's Case (6). To this latter proposition the court appears to have assented; but DODERIDGE, J., suggested that, even if the licence was in force, still the licensor did not by such a licence preclude himself, nor consequently his tenant, from turning cattle on the land, and that the licensee ought to have taken care to protect the hay from the cattle. As to this, however, the Chief Justice expressed a doubt. The defendant's counsel was heard some days afterwards, and he alleged that it appeared by the record that the plaintiff had had two years to sell his hay before the defendant's cattle had eaten it, and he argued that the court would say, as a matter of law, that this was more than a reasonable time, and to this the court assented. The plaintiff's counsel, in reply, adverted to the distinction between a licence for profit and a licence for pleasure, but DODERIDGE, J., denied it, and said, that a licence to dig gravel, though a licence for profit, is revocable. He said that the true distinction was between a mere licence and a licence coupled with an interest. HOUGHTON, J., said that a licence executed was irrevocable, but a licence executory was revocable. Judgment was eventually given for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff had had more than reasonable time to sell the hay. It will be seen, therefore, that the only two points decided were, first that the question of reasonable time was for the court, and not for the jury; secondly, that two years was more than a reasonable time. The decision, therefore, itself has no bearing on the point for which it was cited, and the only support which the case affords to the doctrine contended for by the present plaintiff is from what is said in the report of the case in POPHAM to have been agreed by the court, namely, that a licence for profit for a time certain is not revocable—a proposition to which, with the qualification we have already pointed out, we entirely accede. It is, moreover, by no means certain that the licence in Webb v. Paternoster (1) was not a licence under seal.

The defendant's counsel appears, from the report in ROLLE, to speak of the plaintiff as grantee of the liberty to stack hay, etc., an expression not very appropriate, if used in respect of a party who had a mere parol licence, and the Chief Justice, according to the report in POPHAM and PALMER, says that the plaintiff had an interest which charged the land into whose hands soever it should come. DODERIDGE, J., according to the report in PALMER, arguing that the lessee certainly might turn his cattle into his own field, and was not bound to stop their mouths, says,

"It was the folly of the plaintiff that he did not, together with the licence, take a covenant that it should be lawful for him to fence the hay with a hedge."

From these expressions (and there are others to the various reports of the case, having a similar aspect), it certainly seems possible that the licence was under seal, and then the only point would be that which alone was in fact decided, namely, whether, supposing the plaintiff to have acquired by grant a right to stack his hay on the land for a limited time, that limited time had expired. Even supposing the licence to have been a mere parol licence, yet the strong probability is that Webb had purchased the hay in question of Sir William Plummer as a growing crop, with liberty to stack it on the land, and then the parol licence might be good, as a licence coupled with an interest. Be this; however, as it may, the decision, as we have already pointed out, has very little or rather no bearing on the case before us, and the judgment of DODERIDGE, J., as given both in ROLLE and PALMER, is in strict accordance with what was afterwards laid down by VAUGHAN, C.J., and which we consider to be consonant both to reason and authority.

The next decision in order of time is that of Wood v. Lake (2). There the defendant had, by a parol agreement, given liberty to the plaintiff to stack coals on the defendant's land for a term of seven years, and after the plaintiff had enjoyed this privilege for three years, the defendant locked up the gate of the close. No report is given in SAYER of the argument at the Bar, but, from a manuscript of the same case referred to by GIBBS, C.J., in Taylor v. Waters (3), which we have had an opportunity of consulting, through the kindness of the representatives of the late BULLOUGH, J. [see 13 M. & W. at pp. 848, 849], it appears that the argument turned only on the point whether the privilege of stacking the coals did or did not amount to a lease, for, if it did, then the defendant contended it was void after three years, under the Statute of Frauds, as not being in writing. LEE, C.J., and DENNISON, J., held it to be no lease nor uncertain interest in land; but FOSTER, J., doubted and desired time to consider. On the last day of Term the court gave judgment for the plaintiff (FOSTER, J., non dissentiente), thus establishing the licence to be irrevocable during the seven years. Supposing the court to have been right in deciding that this was not a lease (which, however, is doubted by SIR EDWARD

A SUGDEN : see 1 VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (10th Edn.), p. 139, yet no grounds are stated on which it could be held good as an easement originating merely by parol. Up to this case not a single decision is to be found giving countenance to any such proposition, and we are compelled to say that we do not think it can be supported.

The next case on which the plaintiff relies is Taylor v. Waters (3). It was an action by the plaintiff against the doorkeeper of the Opera House, for preventing
 B him from entering the house during the performance of an opera. It appeared that one William Taylor, being in possession of the Opera House, as lessee for a long term of years, by a deed dated Aug. 24, 1792, assigned his interest therein to trustees, on various trusts for creditors and other claimants, and ultimately in trust for himself. After the execution of this deed, Taylor continued in possession by permission of the trustees, and he carried on and managed the concerns of the
 C theatre. In March, 1799, he, by deed, granted to one Gourgas, for valuable consideration, six silver tickets, entitling the holders to admission to the theatre. One of these tickets was sold by Gourgas to the plaintiff, in July, 1799, but no deed of assignment to him was executed. In 1800 Taylor's trustees took possession of the theatre. The plaintiff, however, was allowed to attend the theatre by virtue of his ticket, until the year 1814, when the defendant Waters, as servant of the D trustees, prevented him from entering the theatre, and for this obstruction the action was brought. The cause was tried before GIBBS, C.J., and a verdict was found for the plaintiff, and that verdict was afterwards upheld by the Court of Common Pleas. The grounds of the judgment were that the right under the silver ticket was not an interest in land, but a licence irrevocable to permit the plaintiff to enjoy certain privileges therein; that it was not required by the Statute of E Frauds to be in writing, and, consequently, that it might be granted without a deed. The Chief Justice, in support of that doctrine, relied on Webb v. Paternoster (1), which, he said, showed that a beneficial licence to be exercised upon land might be granted without deed, and could not be countermanded, at least, after it had been acted upon. The same case, he added, showed that the interest was not such an interest in land as was required by the Statute of Frauds to be
 F in writing, as to which last point all doubt, if there remained any, had been removed by Wood v. Lake (2). This judgment is stated by the learned reporter to have comprised the substance of the argument on both sides, and, therefore, he does not give it in his report.

We must infer from this that the attention of the court was not called in the argument to the principles and earlier authorities to which we have adverted.
 G BROOK, in his ABRIDGMENT, DODERIDGE, J., in Webb v. Paternoster (1), and LORD ELLENBOROUGH, in R. v. Horndon-on-the-Hill (Inhabitants) (7), all state, in the most distinct manner, that every licence is, and must be in its nature, revocable, so long as it is a mere licence. Where, indeed, it is connected with a grant, there it may, by ceasing to be a naked licence, become irrevocable but then it is obvious that the grant must exist independently of the licence, unless, indeed, it be a grant
 H capable of being made by parol.

In Taylor v. Waters (3) there was no grant of any right at all, unless such right was conferred by the licence itself. GIBBS, C.J., gives no reason for saying the licence was a licence irrevocable, and we cannot but think he would have paused before he sanctioned a doctrine so entirely repugnant to principle and to the earlier authorities, if they had been brought before the court. Again, the Chief Justice
 I is represented as saying that the interest of the plaintiff was not an interest in land within the Statute of Frauds, and that consequently it might be granted without deed. How the circumstance that the interest was not an interest in land within the Statute of Frauds showed it to be grantable without deed, we cannot discover. The precise point decided in Webb v. Paternoster (1) is not adverted to, and it is assumed without discussion, that the licence there must have been a parol licence, and a naked licence, unconnected with an interest capable of being created by parol. With all deference to the high authority from which the judgment in Taylor v. Waters (3) proceeded, we feel warranted in saying that it is to the last degree unsatisfactory, an observation which we have the less hesitation in making in consequence of its having obviously been doubted by the Court of Queen's Bench and BAYLEY, J., in Hewlins v. Shippam (8). A

The fourth and last case relied on by counsel for the plaintiff was Wood v. Manley (4), in the Queen's Bench. That was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. The plea was that the defendant was possessed of a large quantity of hay, being on the plaintiff's close, and that by the leave of the plaintiff he entered on the close in question to remove it. The replication de injuria. It was proved at the trial that the hay in question was sold in January, 1838, by the plaintiff's landlord, who had seized it on a distress for rent. The conditions of the sale were that the purchaser of the hay might leave it on the close until Lady-day, and might, in the meantime, come on the close from time to time as often as he should see fit to remove it. These conditions were assented to by the plaintiff. The defendant became purchaser, and afterwards and before Lady-day the plaintiff locked up the close. The defendant broke open the gate in order to remove the hay. A verdict was found for the defendant, ERSKINE, J., telling the jury that the licence to come from time to time to remove the hay was irrevocable. MR. CROWDER moved to set aside this verdict on the ground that the licence was necessarily revocable and was in fact revoked, but the Court of Queen's Bench refused to grant a rule, and we think quite rightly. This was a case not of a mere licence, but of a licence coupled with an interest. The hay, by the sale, became the property of the defendant, and the licence to remove it, therefore, became, as in the case of the tree and the deer put by VAUGHAN, C.J., irrevocable by the plaintiff, and the rule was properly refused. B C D

It appears, therefore, that the authorities really supporting the present plaintiff in the proposition for which he is contending are confined to the two cases of Wood v. Lake (2) and Tayler v. Waters (3), in neither of which was the real difficulty discussed or even stated. It was in both cases taken for granted that if the Statute of Frauds did not apply, a parol licence was sufficient, and the necessity of an instrument under seal, by reason of the interest in question being a right in nature of an easement, was by some means kept entirely out of sight. For these reasons, even if there had been no conflicting decisions, we should have thought these cases to be very unsafe guides in leading us to a decision on an occasion where we are called on to lose sight of the ancient land-marks of the common law. E F

We are not, however, driven to say that we shall disregard these cases merely on principle, giving to them the full weight of judicial decision. They are met by several others which we must entirely disregard before we can adopt the arguments of the plaintiff. In Fentiman v. Smith (9) and R. v. Horndon-on-the-Hill (Inhabitants) (7), which were before Tayler v. Waters (3), LORD ELLENBOROUGH and the Court of Queen's Bench expressly recognised the doctrine that a licence is no grant, and that it is in its nature necessarily revocable; and they further declare that, in order to confer an incorporeal right, an instrument under seal is essential. In the elaborate judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, given by BAYLEY, J., in Hewlins v. Shippam (8), the necessity of a deed for creating an incorporeal right was expressly recognised, and formed the ground for the decision. It is true that the interest in question in that case was a freehold interest, and on that ground BAYLEY, J., suggests that it might be distinguished from Wood v. Lake (2) and Tayler v. Waters (3), but in an earlier part of that judgment he states, conformably to what is clear law, that, in his opinion, the quantity of interest made no difference. The distinction is evidently adverted to by him, not because he entertained the opinion that it really was of importance, but only to enable him to decide that case without in terms saying that he did not consider Tayler v. Waters (3) to be law. The doctrine of Hewlins v. Shippam (8) has since been recognised and acted upon in Bryan v. Whistler (10), Cocker v. Cowper (11), and Wallis v. Harrison (12); and it would be impossible for us to adopt the plaintiff's view of the law without holding all those cases to have been ill decided. It was suggested G H I

A that in the present case a distinction might exist by reason of the plaintiff having paid a valuable consideration for the privilege of going on the stand, but this can make no difference. Whether it may give the plaintiff a right of action against those from whom he purchased the ticket, or those who authorised its being issued and sold to the plaintiff, is a point not necessary to be discussed. Any such action would be founded on a breach of contract, and would not be the result of his having

B acquired by the ticket a right of going upon the stand in spite of the owner of the soil; and it is sufficient on this point to say that in several of the cases which we have cited (Hewlins v. Shippam (8), for instance, and Bryan v. Whistler (10)), the alleged licence had been granted for a valuable consideration, but this was not held to make any difference. We do not advert to Winter v. Brockwell (13) and Liggins v. Inge (14), or other cases ranging themselves in the same category, as they were

C decided on grounds inapplicable to the case now before us, and were, in fact, admitted not to bear upon it. In conclusion, we have only to say that, acting on the doctrine relative to licences as we find it laid down by BROOKE, by DODERIDGE, J., and by VAUGHAN, C.J., and sanctioned by Hewlins v. Shippam (8), and the other modern cases proceeding on the same principle, we have come to the conclusion that the direction given to the jury at the trial was correct, and conse-

D quently that this rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiff to set aside a nonsuit and enter a verdict for him in an action on the case brought by the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendants for the loss of luggage. D

The declaration stated that the defendants were the owners of the Newcastle and Berwick Railway, and of divers carriages for the conveyance of passengers, goods and chattels, along the railway from Darlington to London, for hire and reward to them, the defendants; that thereupon the plaintiff, at the request of the defendants, became and was a passenger in one of their carriages, to be by them safely and securely conveyed and carried, together with his luggage, along the railway from Darlington to London, for reward to the defendants; that the defendants then received the plaintiff as such passenger, together with his luggage, to wit, a certain portmanteau, containing divers goods of the plaintiff; and that it was the duty of the defendants to use due and proper care that the plaintiff and his luggage should be safely and securely carried and conveyed, but that, by their carelessness, negligence and default, the luggage became wholly lost to the plaintiff. E
The defendants pleaded that the plaintiff did not become, nor was he, a passenger in one of their carriages, to be by them safely and securely carried and conveyed thereby, together with his luggage, on the journey, and alleged that they did not receive the luggage of the plaintiff for the purpose in the declaration mentioned modo et forma. F

At the trial before JERVIS, C.J., it appeared that the plaintiff, a servant of Lord Adolphus Vane, was, in company with his master, a passenger on the defendants' railway, having with him his own portmanteau; that his master paid his fare; and that during the journey the plaintiff's portmanteau was lost. JERVIS, C.J., nonsuited the plaintiff on its being objected that the action should have been in the name of the plaintiff's master, leave being reserved to the plaintiff to move to set aside the nonsuit and enter a verdict for him with £30 damages. A rule nisi was obtained. G H

Knowles and H. Hill showed cause against the rule.

Humfrey and Willes supported the rule.

JERVIS, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be made absolute to enter I a verdict for the plaintiff for £30 damages. First, it was said that, under the circumstances of this case, no action would lie; but the admission in the argument, and the authorities on which it was made, put the defendants in considerable difficulty, because it was admitted that, if the plaintiff had had his arm broken, an action would lie at the suit of the servant, the master having no remedy for the personal sufferings of his servant, though he might possibly sustain an action for the loss of his services. But on what principle does the action lie at the suit of the servant for his personal suffering? Not by reason of any contract between him and the

A defendants, but by reason of the breach of duty implied by law to carry him safely, irrespective of any contract. If the plaintiff could have recovered in respect of a personal injury suffered by him, there is no reason why he should not also recover in respect of the loss of his luggage.

Then it is said that the declaration so tied up the plaintiff to a case of contract, and restricted the liability of the defendants that this action cannot be maintained; because the declaration alleges that the defendants received the plaintiff and his luggage to be carried for reward to them, which the cases show to mean hire to be paid by the plaintiff to the defendants. There are two answers to this. First, the averment is not traversed on the record, the words "modo et forma" only being a denial of the allegation in the declaration that the goods were to be carried; and, secondly, these words are to be construed with reference to the rest of the declaration. If the declaration states a duty on the part of the defendants to carry, and that whether the hire is to be paid by the plaintiff or a stranger, the averment is perfectly unimportant. But how does it follow that the hire was not paid here by the plaintiff? The payment was made on his behalf; his master purchased for him a ticket and a seat which was not transferable; in short, the payment was on the plaintiff's account. The rule must, therefore, be made absolute.

D WILLIAMS, J.—I agree that this case was put on a right footing, when it was said that the question turned on whether or not it was necessary to show that there was a contract by the plaintiff with the defendants. There is a series of cases from Govett v. Radnidge, Pulman and Gimblett (1) to Pozzi v. Shipton (2), which shows that an action like this is to be regarded as, in substance, an action of tort founded on the defendants' neglect of duty as common carriers. In FITZ-HERBERT'S NATURA BREVIVM, Writ de Trespass sur le case, p. 94 D, it is laid down:

"If a smith prick my horse with a nail, etc., I shall have my action upon the case against him without any warranty by the smith to do it well. . . . For it is the duty of every artificer to exercise his art rightly and truly as he ought."

F There is no reference to any contract between the parties. It seems to follow from this that the averment of hire and reward is not a necessary allegation in the declaration, and, not being material, it is not involved in the traverse modo et forma. But I think that it was, in fact, proved that the money was paid on the plaintiff's behalf, for he became the proprietor of the ticket. It is not necessary, however, to decide that, for the averment only means that the hire and reward was to be paid by someone: Pippin v. Sheppard (3).

DONALDSON v. DONALDSON

1 Jur.N.S. 10; 2 W.R. 691; 69 E.R. 303]Trust—Declaration of trust—Voluntary assignment of trust property—Notice to original trustees.

Stock was held under a marriage settlement in trust for the settlor absolutely. By a voluntary deed the settlor assigned personalty, including £29,400 of stock, to two named persons as trustees upon the trusts therein declared, and he further declared that he would hold all such property until it was vested in the trustees on the trusts aforesaid. No notice of the assignment was given to the trustees of the settlement, and no transfer of the stock was executed. The settlor died two days after the assignment.

Held: (i) the voluntary deed was a sufficient declaration of trust which the court would execute in favour of the assignees so as to pass the property in the stock; (ii) the omission to give notice to the trustees did not affect the assignees' title as the assignment had completely passed the interest of the settlor to them, and all that they had to do was to give notice to the trustees thereof and their title was complete.

B Suit to determine the validity of a voluntary assignment.

- By a voluntary settlement, dated April 12, 1852, between Thomas Hudson (the testator in the cause) of the one part, and Blamire and the defendants John Donaldson and R. N. Bennett of the other part, reciting, among other things, that Thomas Hudson intended to make the settlement thereafter made, and that in order to carry into effect such intention he had previously thereto duly assigned or transferred unto or into the names of Blamire, Donaldson, and Bennett, or had otherwise well and effectually vested in them, or intended forthwith to transfer unto or otherwise well and effectually vest in them, as such trustees, the several particulars mentioned or comprised in the schedule thereto, Thomas Hudson granted, assigned, and transferred to the trustees all such and so many and such parts and part of the several bonds, debentures, moneys, shares, stocks, securities, and other particulars mentioned or comprised in the schedule thereto as had not been or were not then effectually vested in the trustees, and which he, Thomas Hudson, could or might grant or assign by that indenture, and all the real estates subject to the several mortgage securities mentioned in the schedule, together with all sums of money due and owing, or recoverable or receivable, or otherwise secured upon or by virtue of the same securities and premises respectively, and all interest, dividends, etc., to hold upon the trusts thereafter declared.

- E Hudson then covenanted with the trustees forthwith to transfer or otherwise well and effectually vest in, or cause to be transferred or otherwise well and effectually vested in, the trustees all or such parts of the said particulars as had not been already vested or transferred, or did not fully and completely pass by the assignment thereinbefore contained. The deed then proceeded to declare the trusts, being the usual trusts of a voluntary settlement of personalty; and then it was declared, that in the meantime, and until all and singular the premises and particulars mentioned in the said schedule should be transferred or otherwise effectually vested in the said trustees, on the trusts therein declared, he, the said Thomas Hudson, his heirs, executors, etc., should stand possessed of and interested in the said particulars and trust premises, or so much thereof as should for the time being not be effectually vested in the said trustees, upon the said trusts thereinbefore declared, or such of them as were for the time being in force.

- G The property in the schedule was valued at between £300,000 and £400,000, and the probate and legacy duty, the bulk being given to grand nephews and nieces, would exceed £14,000 if the deed failed to pass the property. The particulars enumerated comprised—first, large sums of stock in the public funds, East India stock, etc., in the testator's own name; secondly, a sum of £29,400, £3 5s. per cent. bank annuities, in the names of the trustees of Mr. Hudson's marriage settlement, under the trusts of which, Mrs. Hudson being dead without issue, Mr. Hudson was absolutely entitled to that sum; thirdly, moneys secured by mortgage of lands in fee, and a leasehold house in Park Crescent; fourthly, foreign and other securities passing from hand to hand, without any deed or instrument of transfer being necessary; and fifthly, railway shares, debentures, etc., for the transfer of which some special instrument was necessary to be executed.

I Mr. Hudson had formerly entertained the intention of executing such a voluntary settlement, and a draft deed had been prepared in 1849, but not definitely approved. In 1850 he made his will. In February, 1852, his wife died, and finding it proper to alter some of the gifts in the will, he gave directions to carry out those alterations by a voluntary settlement, which, on April 12, 1852, was finally approved and settled, but not engrossed, in consequence of the great number and variety of particulars in the schedule. In the meantime, Mr. Hudson having unexpectedly become dangerously ill, a codicil, making the necessary alterations in the will, and also the draft settlement, was executed as a testamentary disposition on April 12. On the 13th the testator re-executed the codicil and the settlement. On April 14 the testator died. Previously to the execution of the settlement, the Spanish and other foreign and colonial securities which passed by delivery were delivered by, or by the authority and direction of, Mr. Hudson to the defendant Bennett, who was one of the trustees, on account of and on behalf of the trustees, and were presumed to be well and effectually vested in the said trustees. The shares, debentures, and certificates of stock and title deeds of the real property mentioned in the schedule were also all delivered to Bennett, and so remained up to the death of the testator, on account and behalf of the said trustees. On the morning of the 14th Mr. Hudson executed a power of attorney to effect a transfer of the stock, etc.; but his handwriting being much altered, a special messenger was sent by the bank to make inquiries, who found that Mr. Hudson had just died. Nothing further, therefore, could be done than above stated.

The bill was filed by one of the infant grand-nephews against the trustees and his brothers and sisters, and others interested under the will and settlement; and it prayed that the will and codicil might be established, and the trusts thereof and of the said indenture of settlement carried out, and the usual administration accounts, etc. Immediately after the institution of the suit a petition was presented by the trustees, asking the direction of the court as to the probate or stamp duty to be paid, which question involving the point as to what passed by the settlement, the petition was directed to come on for hearing with the cause. A copy was served on the Attorney-General, who appeared accordingly.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 1, 1854. PAGE-WOOD, V.-C.—In this case a question has been raised how far a deed of assignment, executed by Thomas Hudson, and dated June 29, 1850, by which he voluntarily assigned a large amount of property, consisting of various securities, to trustees upon certain trusts for the benefit of his donees, has been available to pass certain portions of the property included in the deed. The question has arisen between some of the parties claiming under the deed and the Crown, because the property which did not pass by the deed would be liable to probate and legacy duty, as passing by the settlor's will. With respect to the great bulk of the property comprised in the deed, the counsel for the Crown has conceded, that, as it stood in the funds and other securities in the name of the settlor, and as he has executed a declaration of trust contained in this deed, the relation of trustee and cestui que trust has been created, so that this court will give effect to it.

The real question arises with respect to the sum of £29,400 stock, which was standing in the names of the trustees of the settlor's marriage settlement in trust for himself. I do not think that the declaration of trust annexed to the description of this stock in the schedule is material. What I have to consider is, how far an assignment of this kind, of which no notice was given to the trustees in whose names this stock was standing, was effectual to pass the property therein to the trustees of the voluntary deed, so that this court would hold, as between the donees under that deed and the representatives of the assignor, that the title was complete.

For the purposes of this question, it is necessary to consider Kekewich v. Manning (1), in which the other decisions are reviewed and commented on by KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., and which seem to me, if I may use the expression, to stem the current of authority which had begun to set in adversely to these trusts, more

A especially since the decision in Edwards v. Jones (2). Ever since that case there has been considerably more difficulty as to how far a voluntary assignment of a chose in action does or does not confer a title on the donee. Looking through the cases, the principle which I gather from them is the same as that on which the lords justices seem to have proceeded in Kekewich v. Manning (1), and though that case does not go so far as the present, I still think that this is concluded by it.

B In all the cases, except Beatson v. Beatson (3), and particularly in Ex parte Pye (4), it is laid down, that, when there is a complete declaration of trust by a party concerning stock or choses in action vested in himself, this court will enforce it. On the other hand, where there is a contract only, or an imperfect gift, which requires some other act to complete it on the part of the assignor or donor, the court will not interfere to require anything else to be done by him. The intermediate cases alone are difficult of solution. The question in every case is whether there has been a complete declaration of trust, or whether the assignor performed such acts that the donee can take advantage of them without requiring any further act to be done by the assignor; and, if the title is so far complete that this court is not called upon to act against the assignor, it will assist the donee in obtaining the property from any person who would be treated as a trustee for him.

D In Beatson v. Beatson (3), alone, there was an assignment of an equitable interest in stock, which was vested not in the donor but in a third party, and it was held that the court would not assist the volunteer. In Dillon v. Coppin (5), stock standing in the donor's own name was assigned, and there this distinction was taken, which was somewhat nice, but still consistent with Ellison v. Ellison (6) and the other cases, namely, that, the stock being in the name of the donor himself, and there being no declaration of trust but a mere assignment, which would not pass the stock at all, and the deed showing an evident intention on the part of the assignor to do some further act, and containing a covenant to perfect the gift, the court said, we cannot call upon the donor to transfer the stock or complete the gift. But in the case of an assignment of the equitable interest in stock standing in the names of trustees, the deed of assignment passes the whole equitable interest of the donor, and the donee may go with that deed to the trustees, and say, transfer to me the interest in this sum of stock; and I think that in such a case it would not even be necessary to make the donor a party to a suit to enforce the gift.

Then the question is, whether, notice not having been given to the trustees, the gift can be enforced. As to that it has been said in some cases, that the gift is complete when no further act is required to be done by the donor or the donee: and that seems to imply a doubt, whether, if there were any act to be done by the donee, the gift could be treated as complete. But the assignment has completely passed the interest of the donor. It is true, that, if no notice of it were given to the trustees, they would be justified in transferring the stock to the original cestui que trust for whom they held it; and, if they did so, there would be no remedy against them; and it is possible that the donee might not be able to recover the stock; but all that the donee has to do is, at any time he thinks fit, to give notice to the trustees before the stock is transferred; and when he has given such notice his title is complete: and, unless the donor or his executors actually obtain possession of the fund, the donee does not require the aid of this court against them. The fact, that the trustees are themselves the executors of the donor in this case, I think does not make any difference. As the donor has not obtained possession of the fund, the donees have a right to go to the trustees and require them to transfer the stock, or come to the court to have that done. The donees require no assistance from the court against the original assignor, and therefore the assignment is such as the court will support.

That is the principle upon which cases like Sloane v. Cadogan (7) proceed, and which LORD COTTENHAM seems to recognise in Edwards v. Jones (2), where he says (1 My. & Cr. at pp. 238, 239):

"In Sloane v. Cadogan (7), the claim was not against the donor or his representatives, for the purpose of making that complete which had been left imperfect, but against the persons who had the legal custody of the fund; and the question was, whether the transaction constituted them trustees for the fund for the cestui que trusts. SIR WILLIAM GRANT came to the conclusion that it did; and the consequence was, that they were bound to account. That case has been considered by SIR EDWARD SUGDEN as going a great way; but, upon the principle stated by SIR WILLIAM GRANT, it is free from all possible question, for there was no attempt in that case to call in aid the jurisdiction of the Court."

In the present case there is no need whatever for the donees to call in aid the jurisdiction of this court against the original assignor or his representatives. All that they have to do is, to require the trustees who hold the fund to transfer it to them. This decision goes somewhat beyond all the authorities, except Sloane v. Cadogan (7); but I cannot hold that the owner of an equitable interest in a chose in action is not entitled to assign it; and I think, that, upon the principle recognised in Ellison v. Ellison (6), and like cases, I must decide that the equitable interest in this stock was effectually assigned by this deed.

Order accordingly.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL v. GRAINGER AND ANOTHER

Charity—Limitation of action—Property held in trust for one or other of rival claimants.

Charity—Perpetuities—Gift over of property from one charity to another.

The corporation of L., as trustees of Christ's Hospital, claimed property bequeathed by a testator to the corporation of R. for charitable purposes under a limitation in his will that, if the corporation of R. should for one year neglect to perform the directions contained in his will, the legacy to R. corporation should be void and of no effect and be transferred forthwith to the corporation of L. for the benefit of Christ's Hospital. The trusts had remained unperformed, and the corporation of L. had been aware of the non-performance for more than twenty years before the institution of the present suit. The Attorney-General, who was a party to the suit, had taken no part in the proceedings in the court below, but he sought to appeal from the decree made there and to raise further questions on the hearing of the appeal.

Held: (i) the contingent limitation was not void as an infringement of the rule against perpetuities which was intended to prevent property being inalienable beyond certain periods, and this property was no more or less alienable on account of the transfer from R. corporation to L. corporation; (ii) the claim was not barred by the lapse of more than twenty years during which the corporation of L. had been aware of the facts, since the question was not whether time was a bar to any claim adverse to the title of the original donee, but whether that title was to be superseded in favour of those to whom the testator had directed his property to be transferred on the non-performance of the trusts by the original donee; (iii) to hold that this cesser and transfer could not apply on

- A the ground that the object of a testator should not be defeated by the acts of trustees would be to defeat, not to forward, the object of the testator, whose directions in this respect were themselves dependent on the acts of the trustees; (iv) the Attorney-General would not be prevented from raising such case as he now sought to do, but the court did not approve of his action in re-opening a matter which he had not opposed in the court below, where he ought to have raised his whole case.

B Quære whether such an allowance would be made for a private individual.

Appeal by the Attorney-General, a defendant, from a decision of SHADWELL, V.-C., reported 16 Sim. 83, in an action brought by the corporation of London for a declaration that they were entitled to have a conveyance and transfer made to them of certain trust property and funds for the benefit of Christ's Hospital.

- G LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.—This is an appeal by the Attorney-General, who is a defendant in the cause, and the first question to be considered is the position which the Attorney-General has assumed by this re-hearing.

The corporation of London, as governors of Christ's Hospital, by the bill, claimed certain property which had been left by the testator, John Hendricke, in 1624, to the corporation of Reading, for certain charitable purposes in that town, with a direction that if the donees should for a year neglect, omit, or fail to perform the directions of his will, such gift should be utterly void, and should forthwith be paid and transferred to the corporation of London, for the benefit of Christ's Hospital. The strict execution of the directions of the will having been found inconvenient, an information was filed by the Attorney-General, in the Court of Exchequer, against the corporations of London and Reading, which led to a decree in 1639, varying the purposes and application of the charity, but still confined to Reading, and providing, as in the will, that if the corporation of Reading should neglect to perform the directions of the decree, or should misemploy the trust property, and such neglect and misemployment should continue for a year, the legacy should be void and have no effect as to Reading, and that the property should be forthwith paid and transferred to the corporation of London, for the benefit of Christ's Hospital. That the directions of this decree, as well as those of the will, have been neglected and unperformed for the period of far more than one year, is a fact clearly established and not in dispute on this re-hearing. Upon this fact, the corporation of London, by their bill, sought to recover the property for the benefit of Christ's Hospital, and this the decree of SHADWELL, V.-C., directed. A

The Attorney-General was properly a party to this suit, but, as it appears, took no part in the discussion. To this there can be no objection, there being before the court parties, the trustees for the town of Reading, immediately interested in resisting the claim of the plaintiffs; but that course could only be unobjectionable upon the Attorney-General's having considered that he might properly not only leave the discussion to the other defendants, but abide by the decision upon it. I cannot approve of any party after a decree which he did not oppose, re-opening the discussion by a re-hearing. As to such a party, the proceeding is in effect an original hearing. What might be the result of such an attempt by an ordinary party I need not now decide, because in case of charities the court is less strict in enforcing its rules of proceeding, and will not, upon such an objection, refuse to hear such case as the Attorney-General may have to make. The only case that the Attorney-General can make upon this re-hearing, and what he has attempted, is to show that the bill ought to have been dismissed; that so far as this cause is concerned, the court ought to have decided that although the directions of the will and of the decree of the Exchequer have been wholly neglected, and the charity property therefore misapplied, the town of Reading is nevertheless to continue in the enjoyment of the property. Such, in point of form, must be the contention of the Attorney-General, but such is not and cannot be his real object. Finding that the decree shuts out the case which he had thought it right to present to the court upon an information, he takes this step to remove that impediment out of his way. This again shows how unfortunate it is he did not raise the whole case in the court below, which might and ought to have been done by the cause and the information being heard together. B C D E

This court is well justified in regretting and possibly in complaining that this was not done; but I do not think it right upon these grounds to decline giving my opinion upon the points now raised for the first time by the Attorney-General, and I proceed, therefore, to consider them, bearing in mind that this is a gift to a corporation upon certain charitable trusts, with a proviso that in a certain event such gift shall cease, and the property be transferred to another corporation for certain other charitable trusts; and that the event upon which such cesser and transfer were directed to take place has happened. F

Brown v. Higgs (1) (8 Ves. at p. 574), was cited as proving that the gift over could not take effect from the act of the trustees. That case not only does not support that proposition, but proceeds upon a principle inconsistent with it, for it only upon this point decided that the object of a testator should not be disappointed by the neglect of a trustee; but in this case the testator has made the gift over to depend upon the act of the trustees; and to hold that the act of the trustee was inoperative for that purpose, would be to defeat, and not forward his object. The Attorney-General, however, further contends, that this provision for cesser and transfer was void, as repugnant to the original gift. This is so if the original gift was indefeasible, but not otherwise, and that is the question; the proposition, therefore, is only a consequence of the point in dispute if decided one way, and not an argument for the decision. G H

It was then argued that it was void, as contrary to the rules against perpetuities. These rules are to prevent, in the cases to which they apply, property from being alienable beyond certain periods. Is this effect produced, and are these rules invaded by the transfer, in a certain event, of property from one charity to another? If the corporation of Reading might hold the property for certain charities in Reading, why may not the corporation of London hold it for the charity of Christ's Hospital in London? The property is neither more nor less alienable on that account. I

The next argument was, that the forfeiture created by the will was destroyed by the decree, or that the forfeiture created by the decree was inoperative, being beyond the jurisdiction of the court. These arguments are not very consistent.

A If the court exceeded its jurisdiction in the provision for the transfer, the provisions of the will were not affected by it; but, in fact, the decree only varied the first trusts prescribed by the will, substituting others, but preserved the forfeiture; and, whether the forfeiture under the will or under the decree be the operative provision is not material, it being established that the event has happened, which, under either, was to create the cesser and transfer. To meet this answer, it was
B contended that the bill sought relief only under the provisions of the will; but that is not so, for the bill alleges that

"the plaintiffs are advised that under the circumstances before stated, the limitation over in favour of the plaintiffs, contained in the will, has taken effect, and that the plaintiffs are now entitled, under the provisions of the will and of the decree, to have the estates and property transferred to them."

C Lastly, it was contended that the plaintiffs' claim was barred by time, more than twenty years having elapsed since the facts which are said to have created the forfeiture, and since the plaintiffs knew of these facts. Time is permitted to create a bar in order to quiet titles. Is, then, the Attorney-General contending that time has sanctioned the breaches of trust committed by the corporation of Reading, and that the purposes to which they applied the trust property are not to be disturbed? This cannot be, and is not, the object of the Attorney-General.
D His object is to let in the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of having the property applied to purposes distinct from any provisions of the will or decree. He repudiates the purposes to which the corporation of Reading were directed to apply the property as much as he does those to which the corporation of London were directed to apply it. Is this quieting the title of the corporation or of those
E who now claim in their place? The question is not, whether time is a bar to any claim adverse to the title of the original donee, but whether such a title is to be superseded in favour of those to whom, upon failure of such title, the testator has given the property, or in favour of general charity, unconnected with any expressed object of the testator.

F If, indeed, there were adverse claims between cestuis que trust, time might create a bar as between them, though it could not as between cestuis que trust and a trustee upon the principle ultimately established in Marquis of Cholmondeley v. Clinton (2), but that is not the case here. Both the contending parties, the Attorney-General and the plaintiffs, under the same facts claim the property which, up to the present time, has remained in the hands of the forfeiting party, who no longer disputes the forfeiture. As between the Attorney-General and the plaintiffs
G there has not been any adverse title or possession.

Some confusion may have arisen from the use of the word forfeiture. In one sense, the cesser of one set of trusts and the commencement of the other may be considered as a forfeiture, but the form and substance of the provisions is rather a substitution of one trust for another. The property was vested in the corporation of Reading, but in a certain event they were to become trustees of it for Christ's Hospital. If the effect of these provisions was to constitute the corporation of Reading in the event which happened trustees for Christ's Hospital until they transferred the property as directed (and such it would seem was the only interest they had, and the only duty they had to perform), there could not have arisen as between them and the plaintiffs any question of time or adverse possession, but that is not the question I have to consider. It appears to me that the Attorney-General cannot maintain the points he has attempted to establish upon this re-hearing, and that the decree of SHADWELL, V.-C., must be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

I

Demurrer to a declaration in an action in which the plaintiff, the lessee and manager of the Queen's Theatre, London, claimed damages from the defendant who, he alleged, had caused one Johanna Wagner to break a contract by which she had undertaken to perform at the plaintiff's theatre for a specified time.

The declaration, by its first and second counts, stated that the plaintiff managed the theatre for performing operas for gain to him, and that he had contracted and agreed with Johanna Wagner to perform in the theatre for a certain time, with a condition, among others, that she should not sing or use her talents elsewhere during the term without the plaintiff's consent in writing, yet the defendant, knowing the premises and maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff as lessee and manager of the theatre, while the agreement with Wagner was in force and before the expiration of the term, enticed and procured Wagner to refuse to perform, by means of which enticement and procurement of the defendant, Wagner wrongfully refused to perform, and did not perform during the term. Count 3 stated that Johanna Wagner had been and was hired by the plaintiff to sing and perform at his theatre for a certain time as the dramatic artiste of the plaintiff for reward to her, and had become and was such dramatic artiste of the plaintiff at his theatre, yet the defendant, well knowing, etc., maliciously enticed and procured her to depart from the said employment. In each count special damage was alleged. To the declaration the defendant demurred, and issue was joined.

Cowling for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 3, 1853. The following judgments were read.

CROMPTON, J.—The declaration in this case consisted of three counts. The two first stated a contract between the plaintiff, the proprietor of the Queen's Theatre, and Miss Wagner, for the performance by her for a period of three months at the plaintiff's theatre; and it then stated that the defendant, knowing the premises and with a malicious intention, while the agreement was in full force and before the expiration of the period for which Miss Wagner was engaged, wrongfully and maliciously enticed and procured Miss Wagner to refuse to sing or perform at the theatre and to depart from and abandon her contract with the plaintiff and all service thereunder, whereby Miss Wagner wrongfully, during the full period of the engagement, refused and made default in performing at the theatre. Special damage arising from the breach of Miss Wagner's engagement was then stated. The third count stated that Miss Wagner had been hired and engaged by the plaintiff, then being the owner of the Queen's Theatre, to perform at the theatre for a specified period as the dramatic artiste of the plaintiff for reward to her in that behalf, and had become and was such dramatic artiste for the plaintiff at his theatre for profit to the plaintiff in that behalf, and that the defendant, well knowing the premises and with a malicious intention, while Miss Wagner was such artiste of the plaintiff, wrongfully and maliciously enticed and procured her, so being such artiste of the plaintiff, to depart from and out of the employment of the plaintiff, whereby she wrongfully departed from and out of the service and employment of the plaintiff, and remained and continued absent from such service and employment until the expiration of her said hiring and engagement to the plaintiff by effluxion of time. Special damage arising from the breach of Miss Wagner's engagement was then stated. To this declaration the defendant demurred, and the question for our decision is whether all or any of the counts are good in substance.

The effect of the two first counts is that a person under a binding contract to perform at a theatre is induced by the malicious act of the defendant to refuse to perform and entirely abandon her contract, whereby damage arises to the plaintiff, the proprietor of the theatre. The third count differs in stating expressly that the performer had agreed to perform as the dramatic artiste of the plaintiff, and had become and was the dramatic artiste of the plaintiff for reward to her, and that the defendant maliciously procured her to depart out of the employment of the plaintiff as such dramatic artiste, whereby she did depart out of the employment and service of the plaintiff, whereby damage was suffered by the plaintiff. It was said, in support of the demurrer, that it did not appear in the declaration that the relation of master and servant ever subsisted between the plaintiff and Miss Wagner; that Miss Wagner was not averred, especially in the two first counts, to have entered upon the service of the plaintiff; and that the engagement of a theatrical performer, even if the performer has entered upon the duties, is not of such a

A nature as to make the performer a servant within the rule of law which gives an action to the master for the wrongful enticing away of his servant. It was laid down broadly, as a general proposition of law, that no action will lie for procuring a person to break a contract, although such procuring is with a malicious intention and causes great and immediate injury. The law as to enticing servants was said to be contrary to the general rule and principle of law, to be anomalous, and

B probably to have had its origin from the state of society when serfdom existed and to be founded upon, or upon the equity of, the Statute of Labourers. It was said that it would be dangerous to hold that an action was maintainable for persuading a third party to break a contract unless some boundary or limits could be pointed out; that the remedy for enticing away servants was confined to cases where the relation of master and servant, in a strict sense, subsisted between the parties; and that, in all other cases of contract, the only remedy was against the party breaking the contract.

Whatever may have been the origin or foundation of the law as to enticing of servants, and whether it be, as contended by the plaintiff, an instance and branch of a wider rule, or, as contended by the defendant, an anomaly and an exception from the general rule of law on such subjects, it must now be considered clear

D law that a person who wrongfully and maliciously, or, which is the same thing, with notice, interrupts the relation subsisting between master and servant by procuring the servant to depart from the master's service, or by harbouring and keeping him as servant after he has quitted it and during the time stipulated for as the period of service, whereby the master is injured, commits a wrongful act for which he is responsible at law. I think that the rule applies wherever the wrongful interruption

E operates to prevent the service during the time for which the parties have contracted that the service shall continue, and I think that the relation of master and servant subsists, sufficiently for the purpose of such action, during the time for which there is in existence a binding contract of hiring and service between the parties. I think that it is a fanciful and technical and unjust distinction to say that the not having actually entered into the service, or that the service is not actually

F continuing, can make any difference. The wrong and injury are surely the same whether the wrongdoer entices away the gardener, who has hired himself for a year, the night before he is to go to his work, or after he has planted the first cabbage on the first morning of his service. I should be sorry to support a distinction so unjust, and so repugnant to common sense, unless bound to do so by some rule or authority of law plainly showing that such distinction exists.

G The proposition of the defendant, that there must be a service actually subsisting, seems to be inconsistent with the authorities that show these actions to be maintainable for receiving or harbouring servants after they have left the actual service of the master. In Blake v. Lanyon (1) it was held by the Court of King's Bench, in accordance with the opinion of GAWDY, J., in Adams and Bafealds Case (2), and against the opinion of the two other judges who delivered their opinions in that

H case, that an action will lie for continuing to employ the servant of another after notice, without having enticed him away and although the defendant had received the servant innocently. It is there said (6 Term Rep. at p. 222):

I "A person who contracts with another to do certain work for him is the servant of that other till the work is finished, and no other person can employ such servant to the prejudice of the first master; the very act of giving him employment is affording him the means of keeping him out of his former service."

This appears to me to show that we are to look to the time during which the contract of service exists, and not to the question whether an actual service subsists at the time. In Blake v. Lanyon (1) the party, so far from being in the actual service of the plaintiff, had abandoned that service, and entered into the service of the defendant in which he actually was, but, inasmuch as there was a binding contract of service with the plaintiffs, and the defendant kept the party after notice he was held liable to an action. Since this decision actions for wrongfully hiring or harbouring servants after the first actual service had been put an end to have been frequent: see Pilkington v. Scott (8) and Hartley v. Cummings (9). In Sykes v. Dixon (7), where the distinction as to the actual service having been put an end to was relied upon for another purpose, it does not seem to have occurred to the Bar or the court that the action would fail on account of there having been no actual service at the time of the second hiring or the harbouring; but the question as to there being, or not being, a binding contract of service in existence at the time seems to have been regarded as the real question. A

The objection as to the actual employment not having commenced would not apply in the present case to the third count, which states that Miss Wagner had become the artiste of the plaintiff and that the defendant had induced her to depart from the employment. But it was further said that the engagement, employment, or service, in the present case was not of such a nature as to constitute the relation of master and servant, so as to warrant the application of the usual rule of law giving a remedy in case of enticing away servants. The nature of the injury and of the damage being the same, and the supposed right of action being in strict analogy to the ordinary case of master and servant, I see no reason for confining the case to services or engagements under contracts for services of any particular description; and I think that the remedy, in the absence of any legal reason to the contrary, may well apply to all cases where there is an unlawful and malicious enticing away of any person employed to give his personal labour or service for a given time under the direction of a master or employer who is injured by the wrongful act, more especially when the party is bound to give such personal services exclusively to the master or employer though I by no means say that the service need be exclusive. B C D E

Two nisi prius decisions were cited by the counsel for the defendant in support of this part of the argument. One of these cases, Ashley v. Harrison (3), was an action against the defendant for having published a libel against a performer, whereby she was deterred from appearing on the stage, and LORD KENYON held the action not maintainable. This decision appears, especially from the report of the case in ESPINASSE, to have proceeded on the ground that the damage was too remote to be connected with the defendant's act. This was pointed out as the real reason of the decision by MR. ERSKINE in Tarleton v. M'Gawley (4), tried at the same sittings as Ashley v. Harrison (3). The other case, Taylor v. Neri (5), was an action for an assault on a performer, whereby the plaintiff lost the benefit of his services, and EYRE, C.J., said that he did not think that the court had ever gone further than the case of a menial servant, for that, if a daughter had left the service of her father, no action per quod servitium amisit would lie. He afterwards observed that, if such action would lie, every man whose servant, whether domestic or not, was kept away a day from his business could maintain an action, and he said that the record stated that Breda was a servant hired to sing, and, in his judgment, he was not a servant at all, and he nonsuited the plaintiff. F G

Whatever may be the law as to the class of actions referred to, for assaulting or debauching daughters or servants per quod servitium amisit, which differ from actions of the present nature for the wrongful enticing or harbouring with notice, as pointed out by LORD KENYON in Fores v. Wilson (6), it is clear from Blake v. Lanyon (1) and other subsequent cases, Sykes v. Dixon (7), Pilkington v. Scott (8) and Hartley v. Cummings (9), that the action for maliciously interfering with persons in the employment of another is not confined to menial servants, as suggested in Taylor v. Neri (5). In Blake v. Lanyon (1) a journeyman who was to work by the piece, and had left his work unfinished, was held to be a servant for the purposes of such an action, and I think that it was most properly laid down by the court in that case that a person who contracts to do certain work for another is the servant of that other (of course with reference to such an action) until the work be finished. It appears to me that Miss Wagner had contracted to do work for the plaintiff within the meaning of this rule, and I think that, where a party has contracted to give his personal services for a certain time to another, the parties are H I

- A in the relation of employer and employed, or master and servant, within the meaning of this rule. I see no reason for narrowing such a rule, but I should rather, if necessary, apply such a remedy to a case "new in its instance, but" "not new in the reason and principle of it": Per HOLT, C.J., in Keeble v. Hickeringill (10); that is, to a case where the wrong and the damage are strictly analogous to the wrong and the damage in a well recognised class of cases.
- B In deciding this case on the narrower ground, I wish by no means to be considered as deciding that the larger ground taken by counsel for the plaintiff is not tenable, or as saying that in no case except that of master and servant is an action maintainable for maliciously inducing another to break a contract to the injury of the person with whom such contract has been made. It does not appear to me to be a sound answer to say that the [actionable] act in such cases is the act of the
- C party who breaks the contract, for that reason would apply in the acknowledged case of master and servant. Nor is it an answer to say that there is a remedy against the contractor and that the party relies on the contract, for, besides that reason also applying to the case of master and servant, the action on the contract and the action against the malicious wrongdoer may be for a different matter, and the damages payable for such malicious injury might be calculated on a very different
- D principle from the amount of the debt which might be the only sum recoverable on the contract. Suppose a trader, with a malicious intent to ruin a rival trader, goes to a banker or other party who owes money to his rival, and begs him not to pay the money which he owes him, and by that means ruins or greatly prejudices the party. I am by no means prepared to say that an action could not be maintained, and that damages, beyond the amount of the debt if the injury were great, or much less than such amount if the injury were less serious, might not be recovered. Where two or more parties were concerned in inflicting such injury, an indictment, or a writ of conspiracy at common law, might, perhaps, have been maintainable. Where a writ of conspiracy would lie for an injury inflicted by two, an action on the case in the nature of conspiracy will generally lie, and in such an action on the case the plaintiff is entitled to recover against one defendant without
- F proof of any conspiracy, the malicious injury and not the conspiracy being the gist of the action: see note (4) to Skinner v. Gunton (11), 1 Wms. Saund. at p. 280. In this class of cases it must be assumed that it is the malicious act of the defendant, and that malicious act only, which causes the servant or contractor not to perform the work or contract which he would otherwise have done. The servant or contractor may be utterly unable to pay for anything like the amount of the damage
- G sustained entirely from the wrongful act of the defendant, and it would seem unjust, and contrary to the general principles of law, if such a wrongdoer were not responsible for the damage caused by his wrongful and malicious act.

Without, however, deciding any such more general question, I think that we are justified in applying the principle of the action for enticing away servants to a case where the defendant maliciously procures a party, who is under a valid contract to give her exclusive personal services to the plaintiff for a specified period, to refuse to give such services during the period for which she had so contracted, whereby the plaintiff was injured. I think, therefore, that our judgment should be for the plaintiff.

- ERLE, J.—The question raised upon this demurrer is whether an action will lie
- I by the proprietor of a theatre against a person who maliciously procures an entire abandonment of a contract to perform exclusively at that theatre for a certain time, whereby damage was sustained? It seems to me that it will. The authorities are numerous and uniform that an action will lie by a master against a person who procures that a servant should unlawfully leave his service. The principle involved in these cases comprises the present, for, there, the right of action in the master arises from the wrongful act of the defendant in procuring that the person hired should break his contract by putting an end to the relation of employer and employed, and the present case is the same.

If it is objected that this class of actions for procuring a breach of contract of hiring rests upon no principle and ought not to be extended beyond the cases heretofore decided, and that, as those have related to contracts respecting trade, manufactures, or household service, and not to performance at a theatre, therefore, they are no authority for an action in respect of a contract for such performance, the answer appears to me to be that the class of cases referred to rests upon the principle that the procurement of the violation of the right is a cause of action, and that when this principle is applied to a violation of a right arising upon a contract of hiring, the nature of the service contracted for is immaterial. It is clear that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action in all instances where the violation is an actionable wrong, as in violations of a right to property, whether real or personal, or to personal security. He who procures the wrong is a joint wrongdoer, and may be sued, either alone or jointly with the agent, in the appropriate action for the wrong complained of. Where a right to the performance of a contract has been violated by a breach thereof, the remedy is upon the contract against the contracting party. If he is made to indemnify for such breach, no further recourse is allowed, and, as in case of the procurement of a breach of contract the action is for a wrong and cannot be joined with the action on the contract, and as the act itself is not likely to be of frequent occurrence nor easy of proof, therefore, the action for this wrong, in respect of other contracts than those of hiring, are not numerous, but still they seem to me sufficient to show that the principle has been recognised.

In Winsmore v. Greenbank (12) it was decided that the procuring of a breach of the contract of a wife is a cause of action [the action was for enticement]. The only distinction in principle between this case and other cases of contracts is that the wife is not liable to be sued, but the judgment rests on no such grounds. The procuring a violation of the plaintiff's right under the marriage contract is held to be an actionable wrong. In Green v. Button (13) it was decided that the procuring a breach of a contract of sale of goods by a false claim of lien is an actionable wrong. Shepherd v. Wakeman (14) is to the same effect, where the defendant procured a breach of a contract of marriage by asserting that the woman was already married. In Ashley v. Harrison (3) and in Taylor v. Neri (5) it was properly decided that the action did not lie because the battery, in the first case, and the libel, in the second case, upon the contracting parties were not shown to be with intent to cause those persons to break their contracts, and so the defendants by their wrongful acts did not procure the breaches of contract which were complained of. If they had so acted for the purpose of procuring those breaches, it seems to me they would have been liable to the plaintiffs. To these decisions, founded on the principle now relied upon, the cases for procuring breaches of contracts of hiring should be added. At least LORD MANSFIELD's judgment in Bird v. Randall (15) is to that effect.

This principle is supported by good reason. He who maliciously procures a damage to another by violation of his right ought to be made to indemnify, and that whether he procures an actionable wrong or a breach of contract. He who procures the non-delivery of goods according to contract may inflict an injury, the same as he who procures the abstraction of goods after delivery, and both ought on the same ground to be made responsible. The remedy on the contract may be inadequate, as where the measures of damages is restricted; or in the case of non-payment of a debt where the damage may be bankruptcy to the creditor who is disappointed, but the measure of damages against the debtor is interest only; or, in the case of the non-delivery of the goods, the disappointment may lead to a heavy forfeiture under a contract to complete a work within a time, but the measure of damages against the vendor of the goods for non-delivery may be only the difference between the contract price and the market value of the goods in question at the time of the breach. In such cases, he who procures the damage maliciously might justly be made responsible beyond the liability of the contractor.

With respect to the objection that the contracting party had not begun the

A performance of the contract, I do not think it a tenable ground of defence. The procurement of the breach of the contract may be equally injurious, whether the service has begun or not, and, in my judgment, ought to be equally actionable as the relation of employer and employed is constituted by the contract alone and no act of service is necessary thereto. The result is that there ought to be, in my opinion, judgment for the plaintiff.

WIGHTMAN, J. (read by LORD CAMPBELL, C.J.).—This was a demurrer to a declaration in an action against the defendant for, maliciously, and with intent to injure the plaintiff, causing, procuring and enticing Miss Wagner, who had contracted with the plaintiff to sing at his theatre, to break her contract and refuse to sing, by which he sustained damage.

C

It was contended for the defendant that an action is not maintainable for inducing another to break a contract although the inducement is malicious and with intent to injure; and that the breach of contract complained of is, in contemplation of law, the wrongful act of the contracting party and not the consequence of the malicious persuasion of the party charged which ought not to have had any effect or influence; and that the damage is not the legal consequence of the acts of the defendant. It was further urged that the cases in which actions have been held maintainable for seducing servants and apprentices from the employ of their masters are exceptions to the general rule and are not to be extended, and that the present case, as it appears upon the declaration, is not within any of the excepted cases.

With respect to the first and second counts of the declaration, it was contended for the plaintiff that an action on the case is maintainable for maliciously procuring a person to refuse to perform a contract into which he has entered, by which refusal the plaintiff has sustained an injury; and though no case was cited upon the argument in which such an action had been brought, or directly held to be maintainable, it was said that on principle such an action was maintainable. The authority of COMYNS, C.B., was cited, that in all cases where a man has a temporal loss or damage by the wrong of another he may have an action on the case. In the present case there is the malicious procurement of Miss Wagner to break her contract, and the consequent loss to the plaintiff. Why then may not the plaintiff maintain an action on the case? Because, as it is said, the loss or damage is not the natural or legal consequence of the acts of the defendant. There is the injuria, and the damnum, but it is contended that the damnum is neither the natural nor legal consequence of the injuria, and that, consequently, the action is not maintainable as the breaking her contract was the spontaneous act of Miss Wagner herself, who was under no obligation to yield to the persuasion or procurement of the defendant.

Vicars v. Wilcocks (16), which although it has been much brought into question has never been directly overruled, was relied upon as an authority upon this point for the defendant. That case, however, is clearly distinguishable from the present upon the ground, suggested by TINDAL, C.J., in Ward v. Weeks (17), that the damage in that case, as well as in Vicars v. Wilcocks (16), was not the necessary consequence of the original slander uttered by the defendants, but the result of spontaneous and unauthorised communications made by those to whom the words were uttered by the defendants. The distinction is taken in Green v. Button (13), in which it was held that an action was maintainable against the defendant for maliciously and wrongfully causing certain persons to refuse to deliver goods to the plaintiff by asserting that he had a lien upon them and ordering these persons to retain the goods until further orders from him. It was urged for the defendant in that case that, as the persons in whose custody the goods were were under no legal obligation to obey the orders of the defendant, it was the mere spontaneous act of these persons which occasioned the damage to the plaintiff, but the court held the action to be maintainable though the defendant did make the claim as of right, he having done so maliciously and without any reasonable cause and the damage accruing thereby.

In Winsmore v. Greenbank (12) the plaintiff in his first count alleged that, his wife having unlawfully left him and lived apart from him during which time a considerable fortune was left for her separate use, and she being willing to return to the plaintiff whereby he would have had the benefit of her fortune, the defendant, in order to prevent the plaintiff from receiving any benefit from the wife's fortune and the wife from being reconciled to him, unlawfully and unjustly persuaded, procured, and enticed the wife to continue absent from the plaintiff, and she did by means thereof continue absent from him, whereby he lost the comfort and society of the wife and her aid in his domestic affairs and the profit and advantage he would have had from her fortune. Upon motion in arrest of judgment this count was held good and that it sufficiently appeared that there was both damnum and injuria: it was prima facie an unlawful act of the wife to live apart from her husband, and it was unlawful, and, therefore, tortious, in the defendant to procure and persuade her to do an unlawful act: and, as the damage to the plaintiff was occasioned thereby, an action on the case was maintainable. This case appears to me to be an exceedingly strong authority in the plaintiff's favour in the present case. It was undoubtedly prima facie an unlawful act on the part of Miss Wagner to break her contract, and, therefore, a tortious act of the defendant maliciously to procure her to do so, and, if damage to the plaintiff followed in consequence of that tortious act of the defendant, it would seem, upon the authority of Green v. Button (13) and Winsmore v. Greenbank (12), as well as upon general principle, that an action on the case is maintainable.

A doubt was expressed by LORD ELDON, in Morris v. Langdale (18) whether in an action on the case for slander the plaintiff could succeed upon an allegation of special damage that, by reason of the speaking of the words, other persons refused to perform their contracts with him, LORD ELDON observing that that was a damage which might be compensated in actions by the plaintiff against such persons. It has, however, been remarked with much force by MR. STARKIE, in his TREATISE ON THE LAW OF LIBEL (2nd Edn.), vol. 1, p. 205, that such a doctrine would be productive of much hardship in many cases, as a mere right of action for damages for non-performance of a contract can hardly be considered a full compensation to a person who has lost the immediate benefit of the performance of it. The doubt, indeed, is hardly sustainable on principle, and there are many cases in which actions have been maintained for slanderous words, not in themselves actionable, on the ground of the speaking of the words having induced other persons to act wrongfully towards the plaintiffs, as in Newman v. Zachary (19), where an action on the case was held to be maintainable for wrongfully representing to the bailiff of a manor that a sheep was an estray, in consequence of which it was wrongfully seized. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that, on the general principles on which actions on the case are founded, as well as on authority, the present action is maintainable.

It is not, however, necessary, for the maintenance of the third count of the declaration at least, to rely upon so general a principle, for the case, at all events, appears to me to fall within the cases, which the defendant considers are exceptions to a general rule and in which actions have been held maintainable, for procuring persons to quit the service in which they had been retained and employed. The defendant contends that the exception is limited to the cases of apprentices and menial servants and others to whom the provisions of the Statutes of Labourers would be applicable. It appears to me, however, upon consideration of the cases cited upon the argument, that the right of an employer to maintain an action on the case for procuring or inducing persons in his service to abandon their employment is not so limited, but that it extends to the case of persons who have contracted for personal service for a time, and who during the period have been wrongfully procured and incited to abandon such service, to the loss of the persons whom they had contracted to serve. The right to maintain such an action is by the common law, and not by the Statute of Labourers, which, however, gives a remedy, which the common law did not, in cases where persons within the purview of the statute

A have voluntarily left the service in which they were engaged and have been retained by another who knew of their previous employment. In BROOKE'S ABRIDGEMENT, tit. LABORERS, pl. 21, it is said :

"In trespass it was agreed that at common law, if a man had taken my servant from me, trespass lay vi et armis; but if he had procured the servant to depart and he retained him, action lay not at common law vi et armis, but it lay upon the case upon the departure by procurement."

In Adams and Bafelds Case (2), where the plaintiff declared that his servant departed his service without cause and the defendant knowing him to be his servant retained him, two judges out of three held that the action did not lie at common law unless the defendant procured him to leave the service. In all these cases

C the words "servant" and "service" are used, but there is nothing to indicate the kind of servant or of service in respect of which the dicta and decisions occurred. There is a case in the YEAR BOOK Mich. 10 Hen. 6, fol. 8 B., pl. 30, in which it is said that an action does not lie against a chaplain upon the Statute of Labourers for not chaunting the mass, for it is said he may not be always disposed to sing and can no more be coerced by force of the statute than a knight, esquire or gentleman.

D There is no doubt but that the Statute of Labourers only applied to persons whose only means of living was by the labour of their hands. It was passed in the twenty-third year of Edward III [1349], and it recited that so many of the people, especially workmen and servants, had died of the plague that those that remained required excessive wages so that there was lack of ploughmen and such labourers, and it then obliged every person within the age of sixty, not living in merchandise,

E nor exercising any craft, nor having of his own whereof he might live, nor proper land which he might till himself, to serve whoever might require him at such wages as were paid in the twentieth year of the King's reign or some three years before. The remedies and penalties given by this and the next subsequent Statute of Labourers [25 Edw. 3, St. 2: 1350] were limited to the persons described in them, but the remedies given by the common law are not in terms limited to any description

F of servant or service.

The more modern cases give instances and contain dicta of judges which appear to warrant a more extended application of the right of action for procuring a servant to leave his employment than that contended for by the defendant. In Hart v. Aldridge (20) the plaintiff brought an action for enticing away the plaintiff's servants who worked for him as journeymen shoemakers. It appeared that they worked for the plaintiff for no determinate time, but only by the piece, and had, at the time of the enticing away, each a pair of shoes of the plaintiff unfinished. It was contended that a journeyman hired not for time but by the piece was not a servant, but LORD MANSFIELD said that by being found to be the plaintiff's "journeymen" they were found to be the plaintiff's servants (1 Cowp. at p. 56):

H "The point turns upon the jury finding that the persons enticed away were employed by the plaintiff as his journeymen. It might, perhaps, have been different if the men had taken work for everybody."

In the present case, Miss Wagner was, as stated in the third count and admitted by the demurrer, employed by the plaintiff as his dramatic artiste. Can it make any real difference that in Hart v. Aldridge (20) the persons enticed were employed

I by the plaintiff as his journeymen shoemakers, and that in the present case Miss Wagner was employed by the plaintiff as his dramatic artiste? In both cases the services were the personal services of the persons engaged, and, though the description of the services was very different, the personal service being in the one case to make shoes and in the other to sing songs, it seems to me difficult to distinguish the cases upon any principle. It is the exclusive personal service that gives the right. In Blake v. Lanyon (1), which was a case very similar in respect to the nature of the service to that of Hart v. Aldridge (20), it was stated by the court, as a general proposition, that “a person who contracts with another to do certain work for him is the servant of that other till the work is finished.” A

These cases appear to me to be very strong authorities in favour of the plaintiff, as far at least as regards the third count. Two cases, however, were cited for the defendant, as direct authorities against the maintenance of the present action. The first was that of Ashley v. Harrison (3), in which the plaintiff declared that he had retained Madam Mara to sing publicly for him in certain musical performances which he exhibited for profit at Covent Garden Theatre, but that the defendant, contriving to lessen his profits and to deter Madam Mara from singing, published a libel concerning her which deterred her from singing as she could not sing without danger of being assaulted and ill treated in consequence of the libel. LORD KENYON held, at nisi prius, that the action was not maintainable as the injury was too remote. The case does not appear to have undergone much discussion. It was only a decision at nisi prius, but it is clearly distinguishable from the present, as Madam Mara was deterred from singing, not directly in consequence of anything done by the defendant, but in consequence of her fear that what he did might induce somebody else to assault and ill treat her. The injury in that case may have been well held to be too remote, but it does not at all resemble this, where the loss is the direct consequence of the defendant's act. B C D

The other case was Taylor v. Neri (5), which certainly bears more directly upon the present. The declaration stated that the plaintiff, being manager of the Opera House, had engaged Breda to sing, and that the defendant beat him, whereby the plaintiff lost his service. EYRE, C.J., expressed a doubt whether the action was maintainable, observing that, if such an action could be supported, every person whose servant, whether domestic or not, was kept away a day from his business could maintain an action. He was of opinion that Breda was not a servant at all. The case was very little discussed, was a decision at nisi prius, and does not appear to have undergone much consideration; and, without adverting to some distinctions between that and the present case, it can hardly be considered as an authority of much weight for the defendant. I am, therefore, of opinion that upon the whole case, as it appears upon these pleadings, the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. E F

COLERIDGE, J.—The plaintiff in this case, by the first count of his declaration, shapes his case in substance as follows. He alleges a contract made between himself and Johanna Wagner for her to perform in his theatre in operas for a specified time, i.e., from April 15 to July 15 on certain terms, and, among these, one that she was not during the time to sing or use her talents elsewhere than in his theatre without his written authority. He then complains that the defendant, knowing the premises, and maliciously intending to injure him and to prevent Johanna Wagner from performing according to her contract, while the agreement was in full force, but before the commencement of the term, on April 8, enticed and procured her to make default in singing or performing at the theatre, and to depart from and abandon her contract, against his will and without his written authority, by means of which enticement and procurement she unlawfully and wrongfully wholly refused to perform her contract, and he sustained special damage. The second count applies to an enticement, after certain proceedings in equity, to Johanna Wagner to continue her default for the residue of the term. The third count states that Johanna Wagner was hired and engaged by the plaintiff to sing and perform at his theatre, for a certain time, as his dramatic artiste for reward, and had become and was such dramatic artiste, and complains that the defendant, maliciously intending to injure him, enticed and procured her to depart from and out of his employment. These counts are demurred to, and the demurrers raise the questions whether an action will lie against a third party for maliciously and injuriously enticing and procuring another to break a contract for exclusive service as a singer and theatrical performer, in the first place, while the contract is merely executory, and, in the second, after it is in course of execution? I make no distinction between the counts, and am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to our judgment generally. G H I

A To maintain this action, one of two propositions must be maintained—either that an action will lie against any one by whose persuasions one party to a contract is induced to break it to the damage of the other party, or that the action for seducing a servant from the master or persuading one who has contracted for service from entering into the employ, is of so wide application as to embrace the case of one in the position and profession of Johanna Wagner. After much consideration
B and enquiry I am of opinion that neither of these propositions is true, and they are both of them so important, and, if established by judicial decision, will lead to consequences so general, that, though I regret the necessity, I must not abstain from entering into remarks of some length in support of my view of the law.

It may simplify what I have to say, if I first state what are the conclusions which I seek to establish. They are that in respect of breach of contract the general
C rule of our law is to confine its remedies by action to the contracting parties and to damages directly and proximately consequential on the act of him who is sued; that, as between master and servant, there is an admitted exception; that this exception dates from the Statute of Labourers, 1849, and both on principle and according to authority is limited by it. If I am right in these propositions, the conclusion will be for the defendant, because enough appears on this record to show, as to the D first, that he, and, as to the second, that Johanna Wagner, is not within the limits so drawn.

First then, that the remedy for breach of contract is by the general rule of our law confined to the contracting parties. I need not argue that, if there be any remedy by action against a stranger, it must be by action on the case. To found this, there must be both injury in the strict sense of the word (that is a wrong done).
E and loss resulting from that injury; the injury or wrong done must be the act of the defendant; and the loss must be a direct and natural, not a remote and indirect, consequence of the defendant's act. Unless there be a loss thus directly and proximately connected with the act, the mere intention, or even the endeavour, to produce it will not found the action. The existence of the intention, that is the malice, will in some cases be an essential ingredient in order to constitute the
F wrongfulness or injurious nature of the act, but it will neither supply the want of the act itself, or its hurtful consequence; however complete the injuria, and whether with malice or without, if the act be after all sine damno, no action on the case will lie. The distinction between civil and criminal proceedings in this respect is clear and material, and a recollection of the different objects of the two will dispose of any argument founded merely on the allegation of malice in this declaration if I
G shall be found right in thinking that the defendant's act has not been the direct or proximate cause of the damage which the plaintiff alleges he has sustained. If a contract has been made between A. and B. that the latter should go supercargo for the former on a voyage to China, and C., however maliciously, persuades B. to break his contract, but in vain, no one, I suppose, would contend that any action would lie against C. On the other hand, suppose a contract of the same kind made
H between the same parties to go to Sierra Leone, and C. urgently and bona fide advises B. to abandon his contract, which on consideration B. does, whereby loss results to A. I think no one will be found bold enough to maintain that an action would lie against C. In the first case no loss has resulted—the malice has been ineffectual; in the second, though a loss has resulted from the act, that act was not C.'s, but entirely and exclusively B.'s own. If so, let malice be added, and
I let C. have persuaded, not bona fide but mala fide and maliciously, still, all other circumstances remaining the same, the same reason applies, for it is malitia sine damno, if the hurtful act is entirely and exclusively B.'s, which last circumstance cannot be affected by the presence or absence of malice in C.

Thus far I do not apprehend much difference of opinion. There would be such a manifest absurdity in attempting to trace up the act of a free agent breaking a contract to all the advisers who may have influenced his mind, more or less honestly, more or less powerfully, and to make them responsible civilly for the consequences of what after all is his own act, and for the whole of the hurtful consequences of which the law makes him directly and fully responsible, that I believe it will never be contended for seriously. This was the principle on which LORD KENYON proceeded in Ashley v. Harrison (3). There the defendant libelled Madame Mara, and the plaintiff alleged that, in consequence, she, from apprehension of being hissed and ill-treated, forbore to sing for him, though engaged, whereby he lost great profits. LORD KENYON nonsuited the plaintiff: he thought the defendant's act too remote from the damage assigned. But it will be said that this declaration charges more than is stated in the case last supposed, because it alleges, not merely a persuasion or enticement, but a procuring. In Winsmore v. Greenbank (12) the same word was used in the first count of the declaration, which alone is material to the present case. The Chief Justice, who relied on it and distinguished it from enticing, defined it to mean "persuading with effect"; and he held that the husband might sue a stranger for persuading with effect his wife to do a wrongful act directly hurtful to himself.

Although I should hesitate to be bound by every word of the judgment, yet I am not called on to question this definition or the decision of the case. Persuading with effect, or effectually or successfully persuading, may, no doubt, sometimes be actionable—as in trespass—even where it is used towards a free agent. The maxims, qui facit per alium facit per se, and respondeat superior, are unquestionable, but where they apply the wrongful act done is properly charged to be the act of him who has procured it to be done. He is sued as a principal trespasser, and the damage, if proved, flows directly and immediately from his act, though it was the hand of another, and he a free agent, that was employed. But, when you apply the term of effectual persuasion to the breach of a contract, it has obviously a different meaning. The persuader has not broken and could not break the contract, for he had never entered into any; he cannot be sued upon the contract; and yet it is the breach of the contract only that is the cause of damage. Neither can it be said that in breaking the contract the contractor is the agent of him who procures him to do so; it is still his own act; he is principal in so doing, and is the only principal. This answer may seem technical, but it really goes to the root of the matter. It shows that the procurer has not done the hurtful act; what he has done is too remote from the damage to make him answerable for it.

Winsmore v. Greenbank (12) seems to me to have little or no bearing on the present case. A wife is not, as regards her husband, a free agent or separate person [but see now Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 1, and Married Women (Restraint upon Anticipation) Act, 1949, s. 1]. If to be considered so for the present purpose, she is rather in the character of a servant, with this important peculiarity, that, if she be induced to withdraw from his society and cohabit with another or do him any wrong, no action is maintainable by him against her. In the case of criminal conversation [abolished by Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857], trespass lies against the adulterer as for an assault on her, however she may in fact have been a willing party to all that the defendant had done. No doubt, therefore, effectual persuasion to the wife to withdraw and conceal herself from her husband is in the eye of the law an actual withdrawing and concealing her, and so, in other counts of the declaration, was it charged in this very case of Winsmore v. Greenbank (12). A case explainable and explained on the same principle is that of ravishment of ward. The writ for this lay against one who procured a man's ward to depart from him, and, where this was urged in a case hereafter to be cited (YEAR BOOK, Mich. 11 Hen. 4, fol. 23 A, pl. 46), HANKFORD, J., gives the answer. The reason is, he says, because the ward is a chattel, and vests in him who has the right.

None of this reasoning applies to the case of a breach of contract: if it does, I should be glad to know how any treatise on the law of contract could be complete without a chapter on this head, or how it happens that we have no decisions upon it. Certainly no subject could well be more fruitful or important; important contracts are more commonly broken with than without persuaders or procurers, and these often responsible persons when the principals may not be so. I am aware that

A with respect to an action on the case the argument primæ impressionis is sometimes of no weight. If the circumstances under which the action would be brought have not before arisen, or are of rare occurrence, it will be of none, or only of inconsiderable weight, but if the circumstances have been common, if there has been frequently occasion for the action, I apprehend it is important to find that the action has yet never been tried.

B We find a plentiful supply both of text and decision in the case of seduction of servants, and what inference does this lead to, contrasted with the silence of the books and the absence of decisions on the case of breach of ordinary contracts? Let this too be considered—that, if by the common law it was actionable effectually to persuade another to break his contract to the damage of the contractor, it would seem on principle to be equally so to uphold him, after the breach, in continuing it.

C Upon this the two conflicting cases of Adams and Bafealds Case (2) and Blake v. Lanyon (1) are worth considering. In the first, two judges against one decided that an action does not lie for retaining the servant of another unless the defendant has first procured the servant to leave his master; in the second, this was overruled; and, although it was taken as a fact that the defendant had hired the servant in ignorance, and, as soon as he knew that he had left his former master with work unfinished, requested him to return, which we must understand to have been a real, earnest request, and only continued him after his refusal, which we must take to have been his independent refusal, it was held that the action lay, and this reason is given: “The very act of giving him employment is affording him the means of keeping out of his former service.” Would the judges who laid this down have held it actionable to give a stray servant food or clothing or lodging out of charity? Yet

E these would have been equally means of keeping him out of his former service.

The true ground on which this action was maintainable, if at all, was the Statute of Labourers, to which no reference was made. But I mention this case now as showing how far courts of justice may be led if they allow themselves, in the pursuit of perfectly complete remedies for all wrongful acts, to transgress the bounds which our law, in a wise consciousness as I conceive of its limited powers, has imposed on

F itself, of redressing only the proximate and direct consequences of wrongful acts. To draw a line between advice, persuasion, enticement and procurement is practically impossible in a court of justice. Who shall say how much of a free agents’ resolution flows from the interference of other minds or the independent resolution of his own? This is a matter for the casuist rather than the jurist; still less is it for the juryman. Again, why draw the line between bad and good faith? If advice

G given mala fide and loss sustained entitle me to damages, why, though the advice be given honestly, but under wrong information, with a loss sustained, am I not entitled to them. According to all legal analogies, the bona fides of him who, by a conscious wilful act, directly injures me will not relieve him from the obligation to compensate me in damages for my loss. Again, where several persons happen to persuade to the same effect, and in the result the party persuaded acts upon the

H advice, how is it to be determined against whom the action may be brought, whether they are to be sued jointly or severally, in what proportions damages are to be recovered? Again, if, instead of limiting our recourse to the agent, actual or constructive, we will go back to the person who immediately persuades or procures him one step, why are we to stop there? The first mover, and the malicious mover too, may be removed several steps backward from the party actually induced to

I break the contract: why are we not to trace him out? Morally he may be the most guilty. I adopt the arguments of LORD ABINGER and ALDERSON, B., in Winterbottom v. Wright (21); if we go the first step, we can show no good reason for not going fifty. And, again, I ask how is it that, if the law really be as the plaintiff contends, we have no discussions upon such questions as these in our books, no decisions in our reports? Surely such cases would not have been of rare occurrence: they are not of slight importance, and could hardly have been decided without reference to the courts in banc. Not one was cited in the argument bearing closely enough upon this point to warrant me in any further detailed examination of them.

I conclude, therefore, what occurs to me on the first proposition on which the plaintiff's case rests. A

I come now to the second proposition, that the decisions in respect of master and servant, and the seducing of the latter from the employ of the former, are exceptions grafted on the general law traceable up to the Statute of Labourers. This is, of course, distinct from the question of the extent of the exception, that is, to what classes of servants it applies, but the enquiries are so connected together in fact, and the latter has so obvious a bearing in support of the former, that it will be better to take them both together. B

In the first place, I cannot find any instance of this action having been brought before the statute passed, the weight of which fact is much increased by finding that it was of common occurrence very soon after. The evidence for it is not merely negative, for the mischief and the cause of action appear to have been well known before and the want of the remedy felt. The common law did give a remedy in certain cases, and judges are found pointing out what that remedy was, and to what cases it applied. From the cases collected in FITZHERBERT'S ABRIDGEMENT, tit. LABORERS, it appears that the distinction between the action at common law and the action upon the statute was well known. Wherever the former action lay it was in trespass, and not on the case, in saying which I do not rely merely on the words, writ of trespass, which might be applicable to trespass on the case, but I rely on the operative words of the writ which stated a taking vi et armis. It might be joined with trespass quare clausum fregit or trespass for the asportation of chattels or false imprisonment. The count necessarily charged the taking of the servant out of the service of the plaintiff, whereas the writ upon the statute, as appears from FITZHERBERT'S NATURA BREVIVM, 167 B., charges the retainer and admission of the servant into the defendant's service after he has been induced to withdraw, or has withdrawn without reasonable cause, from that of the plaintiff. C D E

I do not wish unnecessarily to multiply citations from the YEAR BOOKS, but it will be necessary to refer to some, and at greater length than they are found in the abridgments. I begin with one out of the order of time, because it is so full to the purpose, and because it may be referred to as abridged by BROOKE (ABRIDGEMENT, tit. LABORERS, pl. 21.), I think incorrectly in a material point. He says that it was agreed in it that case lay for the departure by procurement, but not where the servant departed without procurement and was afterwards retained. The case is YEAR BOOK Mich. 11 Hen. 4 [1409], fol. 23 A., pl. 46. Not, as he cites it with a slight inaccuracy, 21.22. F

"Thomas Frome brings writ of trespass at the common law against defendant for his close broken, and one J. his servant taken out of his service (pris hors de son service), and certain sheep driven away with force and arms." G

There were different pleadings and much discussion as to the separate causes of action, which introduces some confusion into the case. As to the servant, Tremain pleaded: H

"We found him wandering in a certain place in another county; and there he came and offered his service to us, and made covenant with us to serve us; and so demands judgment." I

Skrene, for the plaintiff, replies:

"He has admitted that the servant was in our service, and that he has received him into his service; and so he has admitted our action."

HANKFORD, J., said, however:

"When the servant was wandering, if the defendant had not cognizance that he was in your service, then this first receiver cannot be adjudged a wrong done by the defendant but by the servant."

Upon this Skrene amends his pleading, and says that the servant made a covenant with the plaintiff to serve him in the office of "berchier" [shepherd]

A "for a whole year, within which year the defendant procured our servant to go out of our service, by force of which procurement he went out of our service within the year, and the defendant retains him in his service; which matter we wish to aver;"

and demands judgment. On which HILL, J., says:

B "His writ of trespass as to the servant does not lie upon the matter shown; for the plaintiff says that the defendant did nothing but procure the servant to go out of his service, by which procurement he went out of his service, and was retained with the defendant, in which case action on the Statute of Labourers is given, and not this action."

Skrene argues:

C "If a man procures my servant to go out of my service, and retains him upon that, he does me wrong."

HANKFORD, J., and HILL, J., both say:

"True it is that he does you wrong: but you shall not have a remedy on this manner of writ as it is here."

D CULPEPER, J.:

"This action is taken upon an action at the common law . . . the actions which were at the common law before the Statute of Labourers are not taken away by that statute; and, if a man procure and abet my servant to go with him in his service, action at common law lies well."

E HILL, J.:

"No, certes, action at common law of trespass does not lie on such a case; for such a procurement cannot be said in any manner to be against the peace."

THIRNING, C.J.:

F "If my servant before the statute went out of my service, I suppose well that no action is given to the master; but if a man took my servant out of my service, there action of trespass lay at the common law, and still lies; and, if I am beaten by the abettment and command of a man, the commander is guilty of trespass: so in the case here, when he shall procure the servant to depart and retains him with him, he seems guilty of trespass."

G But HILL, J., answers him:

"Sir, in your case there is no marvel, because the principal actor in your case is guilty of trespass: but the case at Bar is different; for the procurement only is not a trespass against the peace, nor is the departure of the servant a trespass against the peace; then, if the cause of action is not against the peace, the remainder which follows after it is not trespass against the peace: and I well agree that the defendant in this case is guilty, as of a thing done against the provisions of the statute; and this matter is as clearly within the statute as it could be, both as to the servant, who has departed from his service, and as to the defendant, who has presumed to retain him in his service against the statute."

I HANKFORD, J.:

"I am of the same opinion, as my master has expressed, that, if my servant depart out of my service, at common law I have no action, and the cause was for that between my servant and me the contract sounds in the manner of a covenant in itself (en luy meme), upon which no action was given at the common law without a specialty; and for this mischief was the statute ordained and action given on it; wherefore, if you will not say that he took your servant out of your service, as you have supposed by your writ, this writ is not maintainable."

CULPEPER, J., says :

"If a man procure my ward to go from me, and he goes by his procurement, I shall have ravishment of ward against him."

HANKFORD, J., admits this, and says the reason is, because the ward "is a chattel and vests in him who has the right." After some more discussion, Skrene amends, and says : "He came to our house, and procured our servant, and took him, as we have supposed by our writ." Tremain, being ordered to answer, pleads :

"He was wandering, and offered his service to us; and we received him : without this that we took him in manner as he has alleged."

On this, in the end, they seem to have gone to the country.

There were several points in this case, and it is not clear whether on this part the court was ultimately divided or not, but it is clear that the judges who argued in support of the count as first pleaded contended only that it showed a trespass. THIRNING, C.J., admits that, before the statute, if a servant went out of the service no action lay, but if he was taken trespass did; and then contends that the procuring in the case at Bar was a taking and made the party guilty of trespass, in which he was clearly wrong. If at this time case lay at common law for procuring the servant to depart, what becomes of the argument of the necessity for the statute. Or if, where one party broke a covenant at the instigation of another case lay, why was not that applicable to the case of a covenanted servant. But it is clear that all agreed in this—if the defendant has taken the servant under such circumstances, you may have trespass at common law now as before the statute, but, if you cannot lay it as a trespass, your only remedy is under the statute.

I may as well add FITZHERBERT'S ABRIDGEMENT (tit. LABORERS, pl. 16), which is fuller, and I think more accurate, than BROOKE'S.

"Trespass at common law of his servant taken out of his service with force. Tremain : We found him vagrant in a certain place in another county, and there he came and proffered his service to us, and made covenant with us to serve. Judgment if action, etc. Skrene : He was retained with us to serve us in the office of a bergier for a year, within which the defendant procured him to go out of our service; by reason of which he went out of our service within the year and hired himself with the defendant. HILL, J. : This action does not lie on the matter. Skrene : If a man procure my servant to go out of my service, and retains him, he does me wrong. HILL and HANKFORD, JJ. : That is true; but you shall not have remedy on such a writ as this is. CULPEPER, J. : The action which was at common law is not taken away by the Statute of Labourers. THIRNING, C.J. : At common law, before the statute, if my servant went out of my service, no action was given me; but, if a man took him out of my service, an action was given at the common law, and still is; and, if I am beaten by the command of another, the commander is a trespasser. HILL, J. : The procurement only is not trespass against the peace, nor the departure of the servant : then, if the cause of the action is not against the peace, the remnant, to wit the retainer, cannot be : but this case here is openly within the statute, as it may be against the servant upon the departure, and against the master upon the retainer. HANKFORD and HILL, JJ. : There was no action at the common law upon the departure, because the contract between the servant and me sounds in covenant in a manner; and for that mischief was the statute made; wherefore, if you will not say that he took your servant, this action does not lie. Whereupon the plaintiff said that the defendant procured his servant etc. and took him : and the other side traversed this : et alii e contra."

But, says FITZHERBERT, it seems that the defendant should have traversed the taking at first in his plea in bar. In a case in YEAR BOOK, Mich. 47 Edw. 3 [1373], fol. 14 A, pl. 15, which was on the Statute of Labourers against a servant for departing within the term for which he was retained, the plea was "we were never in your service." The question was whether that was good without a traverse of

A the retainer, and FINCHDEN, C.J., said this, which was agreed to by the whole court:

B "At common law, before the statute, if a man took my servant out of my service, I should have writ of trespass there, where he was in my service bodily: now the statute was made for this mischief, that if he never comes into my service, after he has made covenant to serve me, but he elognes himself from me, I shall have such writ and suggest that he was retained in my service and departed, as here is: wherefore it is necessary to traverse the retainer;"

which accordingly was done by the defendant, issue taken, and sic ad patriam.

C Any one, I am certain, who will go through the cases abstracted by FITZHERBERT under the title LABORERS, will be satisfied that at common law, before the statute, such an action as the present could not be maintained. Under that title sixty-one cases are abridged. Many of them are for the seduction of servants, but there is no instance of any one in which the action at common law was sustained unless an actual trespass was charged, and it is clear from the case which I have cited at so much length that the distinction between taking and procuring to go was familiar to the lawyers of that day. I can hardly imagine that this could have been D said if the common law would have given relief in such a case, and, if it could, the rapid growth of the action after the Statute of Labourers had passed would be difficult to account for.

E I come then to the Statute of Labourers, 1349, and my object now is to show that nothing in the provisions or policy of that statute will warrant the action under the circumstances of this case, and that the older authorities are decidedly against it. As we learn from the preamble, it was enacted in consequence of the great mortality among the lower classes, especially workmen and servants, in a pestilence which had prevailed in 1348-9. This pestilence will be found mentioned in our historians. In the preamble it is said:

F "Many seeing the necessity of masters, and great scarcity of servants, will not serve unless they may receive excessive wages, and some rather willing to beg in idleness, than by labour to get their living; we considering the grievous in-commodities, which of the lack especially of ploughmen and such labourers may hereafter come, have . . . ordained."

G This preamble is followed by an enactment, that every person of whatever condition, free or bond, able in body, and under the age of sixty, not living by merchandise nor having any certain craft, nor having of his own wherewith to live, nor land of his own on the cultivation of which he may occupy himself, and not being in service, shall be compelled to enter into service when required on customary wages. By s. 2 it is made penal by imprisonment for any mower, reaper, or other labourer or servant of whatsoever state or condition he shall be, to depart from service before the expiration of the term agreed on, and no one is to receive or retain such offender in his service under like pain of imprisonment. This ordinance is the foundation of the action for the seduction of a hired servant. Upon reference to FITZHERBERT, NATURA BREVIVM, 167 B, it will be seen that the writ in such an action always recited the statute.

H It will be observed that, in order to bring a person within the first section, he must have been one who was not living by merchandise, nor having any certain craft, "certum habens artificium," nor having of his own wherewith to live, "habens de suo proprio unde vivere possit," or land of his own in the culture of which he can occupy himself, and these limitations are more pointed by the second statute [25 Edw. 3, St. 2: 1350], which speaks of "messor falcator aut alius operator vel serviens." Looking at these words and the language of the preamble, it is clear that mechanics and labourers in husbandry were the principal objects of the statute, and the decisions were accordingly. FITZHERBERT (NATURA BREVIVM, 168 E) says:

I "And so a gentleman by his covenant shall be bound to serve, although he were not compellable to serve. For if a gentleman, or chaplain, or carpenter, or such which should not be compelled to serve, etc., covenant to serve, they shall be bound by their covenant, and an action will lie against them for departing from their service."

And LORD HALE in a note refers to YEAR BOOK, Mich. 10 Hen. 6 [1431], fol. 8 B, pl. 30, as showing that a writ does not lie on the statute for the departure of a chaplain who is retained to say the mass. Several cases will be found earlier in the YEAR BOOKS to the same effect. In YEAR BOOK, Trin. 50 Edw. 3 [1376], fol. 13 A, pl. 3, is a case in which the parson of B. sued Thomas F., a chaplain, on the Statute of Labourers, and counted of a covenant made with him to serve in the office of seneschal and to be his parochial chaplain for a certain term, and complained of a departure within the term. As to the office of seneschal, the defendant traversed the covenant, and, as to the residue, contended that the statute was only made for labourers and artificers, and he was neither the one nor the other, but the servant of God, and so was not bound by the statute. Clopton, for the plaintiffs, took a distinction between a parochial and a private chaplain, contending that the former, from the variety and daily pressure of his duties, was in many respects to be regarded as a labourer, and within the statute "as any other person of the people." The case was adjourned, the judges of the King's Bench were consulted, the decision was that a chaplain was not bound by the statute, and as to that part of the writ he was discharged. The same law will be found in YEAR BOOK, Mich. 4 Hen. 4 [1402], fol. 2 B, pl. 7, where the count on the statute, against a chaplain, was that he was retained by the plaintiff to be his chaplain and also his proctor and collector of tithes and to serve him "as pees et as maines" for a certain time. The retainer to be proctor and collector was specially traversed, and it was pleaded that his retainer as chaplain was only to do divine service. The decision is not very clearly stated: but FITZHERBERT (ABRIDGEMENT tit. LABOURERS, pl. 51) appears to have understood that it was against the defendant, for he abstracts the case very shortly, and adds:

"quod mirum, for he shall not be compelled to serve, but the statute is in servitio congruo."

Immediately after this he abstracts PASCH. 12 Hen. 6 [1434] thus: "Action on the Statute of Labourers is not maintainable against an esquire." And in YEAR BOOK, Hil. 19 Hen. 6, fol. 53 B, pl. 15 [1441], is a case on the statute, where the count charged a retainer in the office of labourer, and the plea was that "he retained us to collect his rents in a certain place, without this that we were retained with him in the office of labourer."

NEWTON, J., says:

"He cannot be required to serve him in the office of collecting his rents, nor to be his seneschal; which proves that he cannot be punished by this action; for this action lies only against those who can be required to serve the party as a labourer."

Then, by the advice of all, the issue was held well tendered.

I am tempted to add one case more from YEAR BOOK, Mich. 10 Hen. 6, [1431] fol. 8 B, pl. 30. The Prior of W. brings writ on the Statute of Labourers against a chaplain, and counts that he was retained in his service with him for a year to do divine service and that he departed within the year. The defendant's counsel demands judgment of the writ:

"for you see well how he brings this action against a chaplain upon the Statute of Labourers; and the statute is only to be understood against labourers in husbandry. STRANGEWAYS, J.: The writ is not maintainable by the statute; for you cannot compel a chaplain to sing in mass; for that at one time he is disposed to sing it, and at another not; wherefore you cannot compel him by the statute. COTTESMORE, J.: To the same intent; for it was not made but for labourers in husbandry: as in case of a knight, an esquire, or gentleman, you cannot compel them to be in your service by the statute, for that the statute

A is not to be understood but of labourers, who are vagrant, and have nothing whereby to live; these shall be compelled to be in service; but a chaplain hath whereof he may live in common understanding as a gentleman : "

wherefore the writ is abated, by the whole court. BROOKE (ABRIDGEMENT, fol. 57, tit. LABORERS, pl. 47), abstracting this, gives, as the reason of the judgment :

B "for it is to be understood that he hath whereof he may live, and is not always disposed to celebrate divine service."

It will be observed that many of these cases are with respect to chaplains. In one of them it is said that a chaplain is the servant of God; in another that the service for which the retainer is alleged must be a service congruous to his condition. At this distance of time it may be difficult, without more inquiry into history, to assign a reason why there should be such a majority of cases relating to chaplains.

C It must be referable of course to some circumstances in the state of society at those periods. It may be collected from a royal mandate to the archbishops and bishops that the services of stipendiary chaplains were at the date of the statute much in request. The bishops are required to enforce their serving for their accustomed salary under pain of suspension and interdict. This mandate is printed in the

D statutes at large at the end of the statute, but none of the cases refers to it. It is, however, clear that the courts were not laying down any rule of law applicable to chaplains only. They are repeatedly put in the same category with knights, squires, and gentlemen, all who must be understood to have means of living of their own. The courts construed the statute, and as it seems to me quite correctly. They said that if any of these covenants to serve, he will be bound by his covenant, and an

E action will lie at common law for the breach, but if you rely on the compulsion of the statute, such persons are not within it. These authorities, of a date when the statute must have been well understood, might be multiplied, and, whatever may be said of the uncertainty and often conflicting nature of decisions from the YEAR BOOKS, and, however we may now smile at some of the reasonings of the judges, probably not without their weight when uttered, they seem to me satisfactorily to establish the principle that actions framed on the statute were governed

F by a consideration of the object and language of the statute, and that these pointed only to the compulsion of labourers, handicraftsmen, and people of low degree who had no means of their own to live upon, and who, if they did not live by wages earned by their labour, would be vagrants, mendicants or worse. If this be so, I apprehend it is quite clear that Johanna Wagner could not have been compelled, while the statute was unrepealed, to serve the plaintiff in any of the capacities

G stated in this declaration.

Nor, I think, can it be successfully contended that we may not take judicial cognisance of the nature of the service spoken of in the declaration. Judges are not necessarily to be ignorant in court of what everyone else, and they themselves out of court, are familiar with; nor was that unreal ignorance considered to be an attribute of the Bench in early and strict times. We find in the YEAR BOOKS the judges reasoning about the ability of knights, esquires and gentlemen to maintain themselves without wages, and distinguishing between private chaplains and parochial chaplains from the nature of their employments. And in later days we have ventured to take judicial cognisance of the moral qualities of Robinson Crusoe's "man Friday" [see Forbes v. King (22)] and Esop's "frozen snake" [see Hoare v.

I Silverlock (23)]. We may certainly, therefore, take upon ourselves to pronounce that a singer at operas, or a dramatic artiste to the owner and manager of the Queen's theatre, is not a messor, falcator, aut alius operarius vel serviens, within either the letter or the spirit of the Statute of Labourers. If we were to hold to the contrary as to the profession of Garrick and Siddons, we could not refuse to hold the same with regard to the sister arts of painting, sculpture and architecture. We must lay it down that Reynolds when he agreed to paint a picture, or Flaxman when he agreed to model a statue, had entered into a contract of service, and stood in the relation of servant to him with whom he had made the agreement.

Here we are not without authority. In Taylor v. Neri (5), where the declaration in case stated that the plaintiff, being manager of the Opera House, had engaged one Breda as a public singer during the season at a salary, that the defendant had assaulted and beaten Breda, by which plaintiff lost his service as a public performer, EYRE, C.J., nonsuited the plaintiff, saying the record stated Breda was a servant hired to sing, and he was of opinion he was not a servant at all. It seems to me that this is the language of common sense; and no case has been cited which conflicts with it. But, if Johanna Wagner be not within the statute, and could only have been sued, as at common law, upon her contract for the breach of it, it will follow, I conceive, that the present action could not have been maintained against the defendant while the statute was in force, and, of course, cannot now if, as I contend, the action arises from and is limited by the purview of the statute. Under the statute the one depended on the other: if a party sued on the second branch of the second section, he was bound to show the servant, received or retained wrongfully, was such a one as was spoken of in the first branch, for so were the words, talem in servitio suo recipere vel retinere presumat. In the action, accordingly, against the seducer, the condition of the servant seduced and the character of the service, were always material; if not stated in the count, the defendant introduced them in his plea, where they were such as were thought to take the servant out of the statute. A B C D

I conclude then that this action cannot be maintained because (i) merely to induce or procure a free contracting party to break his covenant, whether done maliciously or not, to the damage of another, for the reasons I have stated, is not actionable; (ii) that the law with regard to seduction of servants from their master's employ, in breach of their contract, is an exception, the origin of which is known, and that that exception does not reach the case of a theatrical performer. I know not whether it may be objected that this judgment is conceived in a narrow spirit, and tends unnecessarily to restrain the remedial powers of the law. In my opinion, it is not open to this objection. It seems to me wiser to ascertain the powers of the instrument with which you work, and employ it only on subjects to which they are equal and suited, and that, if you go beyond this, you strain and weaken it, and attain but imperfect and unsatisfactory, often only unjust, results. But, whether this be so or not, we are limited by the principles and analogies which we find laid down for us, and are to declare, not to make, the rule of law. I think, therefore, with the greatest and most real deference for the opinions of my brethren, and with all the doubt as to the correctness of my own which those opinions, added to the novelty and difficulty of the case itself, cannot but occasion, that our judgment ought to be for the defendant: though it must be pronounced for the plaintiff. M'NAGHTEN'S CASE

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Lyndhurst, L.C., Lord Cottenham, Lord Wynford, Lord Brougham and Lord Campbell), May 26, June 19, 1843]

Criminal Law—Insanity—Defence to charge—Presumption of sanity—Proof that prisoner did not know nature and quality of his act or that he was doing what was wrong—Medical evidence.

C

Where, in a criminal case, the defence is set up that at the time of his committing the offence charged the prisoner was insane, the jury should be directed that every man is presumed to be sane and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crimes until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction, and that to establish a defence on the ground of insanity it must be clearly proved that at the time of committing the act the party accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or, if he did know it, that he did not know that he was doing what was wrong. If the accused was conscious that the act was one which he ought not to do, and if that act was contrary to the law of the land, he is punishable, and it is correct to leave the question to the jury whether he had a sufficient degree of reason to know that he was doing an act that was wrong, with such observations and explanations as the circumstances of each case require. A person labouring under a partial delusion only and not in other respects insane must be considered in the same situation as to responsibility as if the facts in respect to which the delusion exists were real.

F

A medical man, who has been present in court and heard the whole of the evidence may, where the facts are admitted or not disputed and the question becomes substantially one of science only, be asked whether the facts stated by the witnesses show that the prisoner had at the time of the crime a state of mind incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, although he has never seen the prisoner previously to the trial.

House of Lords—Judges of Supreme Court—Right to require attendance—Answers to abstract questions of existing law.

G

The House of Lords has a right to require the attendance of the judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature to answer abstract questions of existing law which might arise for their consideration in their legislative capacity.

Notes. The introduction, by s. 2 of the Homicide Act, 1957 (37 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 174), of the doctrine of diminished responsibility does not, it would seem, affect the validity of the rules laid down in the present case.

Opinions by the judges on questions submitted to them by the House of Lords.

The prisoner, Daniel M'Naghten, was indicted for that he, on Jan. 20, 1843, at the parish of Saint Martin in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex and within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, did feloniously, wilfully, and with malice aforethought, murder one Edward Drummond by shooting him with a pistol. The prisoner pleaded Not Guilty. Evidence having been given of the fact of the shooting of Mr. Drummond, and of his death in consequence thereof, witnesses were called on behalf of the prisoner to prove that he was not, at the time of committing the act, in a sound state of mind. The medical evidence was in substance that persons of otherwise sound mind might be affected by morbid delusions, that the prisoner was in that condition, that a person labouring under a morbid delusion might have a moral perception of right and wrong, but that in the case of the prisoner it was a delusion which carried him away beyond the power of his own control and left him no such perception, that he was not capable of exercising any control over acts which had connection with his delusion, and that it was of the nature of the disease with which the prisoner was affected to go on gradually until it had reached a climax, when it burst forth with irresistible intensity so that he would all at once break out into the most extravagant and violent paroxysms. In his charge to the jury TINDAL, C.J., said:

"The question to be determined is whether at the time the act in question was committed the prisoner had or had not the use of his understanding so as to know that he was doing a wrong or wicked act. If the jurors should be of opinion that the prisoner was not sensible, at the time he committed it, that he was violating the laws both of God and man, then he would be entitled to a verdict in his favour, but if, on the contrary, they were of opinion that when he committed the act he was in a sound state of mind, then their verdict must be against him."

The jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty on the ground of insanity.

This verdict, and the question of the nature and extent of the unsoundness of mind which would excuse the commission of a felony of this sort, having, on Mar. 6 and 13, 1843 [see 67 HANSARD 288, 714], been made the subject of debate in the House of Lords, it was determined to take the opinion of the judges on the law governing such cases. Accordingly, the judges attended their Lordships and the following questions of law were propounded to them:

(i) What is the law respecting alleged crimes committed by persons afflicted with insane delusion in respect of one or more particular subjects or persons, as, for instance, where at the time of the commission of the alleged crime the accused knew he was acting contrary to law, but did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some supposed public benefit?

- A (ii) What are the proper questions to be submitted to the jury when a person alleged to be afflicted with insane delusion respecting one or more particular subjects or persons is charged with the commission of a crime (murder, for example), and insanity is set up as a defence?
- (iii) In what terms ought the question to be left to the jury as to the prisoner's state of mind at the time when the act was committed?
- B (iv) If a person under an insane delusion as to existing facts commits an offence in consequence thereof, is he thereby excused?
- (v) Can a medical man conversant with the disease of insanity, who never saw the prisoner previously to the trial, but who was present during the whole trial and the examination of all the witnesses, be asked his opinion as to the state of the prisoner's mind at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, or his
- C opinion whether the prisoner was conscious at the time of doing the act, that he was acting contrary to law, or whether he was labouring under any and what delusion at the time?

MAULE, J.—I feel great difficulty in answering the questions put by your Lordships on this occasion: First, because they do not appear to arise out of and are not put with reference to a particular case, or for a particular purpose, which might explain or limit the generality of their terms, so that full answers to them ought to be applicable to every possible state of facts, not inconsistent with those assumed in the questions: this difficulty is the greater, from the practical experience both of the Bar and the court being confined to questions arising out of the facts of particular cases. Secondly, because I have heard no argument at your Lordships' Bar or elsewhere, on the subject of these questions, the want of which I feel the more the greater are the number and extent of questions which might be raised in argument. Thirdly, from a fear, of which I cannot divest myself, that as these questions relate to matters of criminal law of great importance and frequent occurrence, the answers to them by the judges may embarrass the administration of justice when they are cited in criminal trials. For these reasons I

F should have been glad if my learned brethren would have joined me in praying your Lordships to excuse us from answering these questions, but as I do not think they ought to induce me to ask that indulgence for myself individually, I shall proceed to give such answers as I can after the very short time which I have had to consider the questions, and under the difficulties I have mentioned, fearing that my answers may be as little satisfactory to others as they are to myself.

G The first question, as I understand it, is, in effect: What is the law respecting the alleged crime when at the time of the commission of it the accused knew he was acting contrary to the law, but did the act with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some supposed public benefit? If I were to understand this question according to the strict meaning of its terms, it would require, in order to

H answer it, a solution of all questions of law which could arise on the circumstances stated in the question, either by explicitly stating and answering such questions, or by stating some principles or rules which would suffice for their solution. I am quite unable to do so, and, indeed, doubt whether it be possible to be done, and, therefore, request to be permitted to answer the question only so far as it comprehends the question whether a person, circumstanced as stated in the question, is,

I for that reason only, to be found Not Guilty of a crime respecting which the question of his guilt has been duly raised in a criminal proceeding. I am of opinion that he is not. There is no law that I am aware of that makes persons in the state described in the question not responsible for their criminal acts. To render a person irresponsible for crime on account of unsoundness of mind, the unsoundness should, according to the law as it has long been understood and held, be such as rendered him incapable of knowing right from wrong. The terms used in the question cannot be said (with reference only to the usage of language) to be equivalent to a description of this kind and degree of unsoundness of mind. If the state described in the question be one which involves or is necessarily connected with such an unsoundness, this is not a matter of law but of physiology, and not of that obvious and familiar kind as to be inferred without proof. A

Secondly, the questions necessarily to be submitted to the jury. Are those questions of fact which are raised on the record. In a criminal trial, the question commonly is whether the accused be guilty or not guilty, but, in order to assist the jury in coming to a right conclusion on this necessary and ultimate question, it is usual and proper to submit such subordinate or intermediate questions as the course which the trial has taken may have made it convenient to direct their attention to. What those questions are, and the manner of submitting them, is a matter of discretion for the judge—a discretion to be guided by a consideration of all the circumstances attending the inquiry. In performing this duty, it is sometimes necessary or convenient to inform the jury as to the law, and if, on a trial such as is suggested in the question, he should have occasion to state what kind and degree of insanity would amount to a defence, it should be stated conformably to what I have mentioned in my answer to the first question, as being, in my opinion, the law on this subject. B C

Thirdly, there are no terms which the judge is by law required to use. They should not be inconsistent with the law as above stated, but should be such as, in the discretion of the judge, are proper to assist the jury in coming to a right conclusion as to the guilt of the accused. D

Fourthly, the answer which I have given to the first question, is applicable to this.

Fifthly, whether a question can be asked, depends, not merely on the questions of fact raised on the record, but on the course of the cause at the time it is proposed to ask it and the state of an inquiry as to the guilt of a person charged with a crime, and defended on the ground of insanity, may be such that such a question as either of those suggested is proper to be asked and answered, though the witness has never seen the person before the trial, and though he has merely been present and heard the witnesses. These circumstances, of his never having seen the person before, and of his having merely been present at the trial, are not necessarily sufficient, as it seems to me, to exclude the lawfulness of a question which is otherwise lawful, though I will not say that an inquiry might not be in such a state, as that these circumstances should have such an effect. E F

Supposing there is nothing else in the state of the trial to make the questions suggested proper to be asked and answered, except that the witness had been present and heard the evidence; it is to be considered whether that is enough to sustain the question. In principle it is open to the objection that as the opinion of the witness is founded on those conclusions of fact which he forms from the evidence, and as it does not appear what those conclusions are, it may be that the evidence he gives is on such an assumption of facts, as makes it irrelevant to the inquiry. But such questions have been very frequently asked, and the evidence to which they are directed has been given, and has never, that I am aware of, been successfully objected to. Evidence, most clearly open to this objection, and on the admission of which the event of a most important trial probably turned, was received in R. v. M'Naghten, tried at the Central Criminal Court in March last, before the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, WILLIAMS, J., and COLERIDGE, J., in which counsel of the highest eminence were engaged on both sides, and I think the course and practice of receiving such evidence, confirmed by the very high authority of these judges, who not only received it, but left it, as I understand, to the jury, without any remark derogating from its weight, ought to be held to warrant its reception, notwithstanding the objection in principle to which it may be open. In cases even where the course of practice in criminal law has been unfavourable to parties accused, and entirely contrary to the most obvious principles of justice and humanity, as well as those of law, it has been held that such practice constituted the law, and could not be altered without the authority of Parliament. G H I

A TINDAL, C.J.—Her Majesty's judges (with the exception of MAULE, J., who has stated his opinion to your Lordships), in answering the questions proposed to them by your Lordships' House, think it right, in the first place, to state that they have forborne entering into any particular discussion upon these questions from the extreme and almost insuperable difficulty of applying those answers to cases in which the facts are not brought judicially before them. The facts of each particular case must of necessity present themselves with endless variety, and with every shade of difference in each case, and as it is their duty to declare the law upon each particular case, on facts proved before them, and after hearing argument of counsel thereon, they deem it at once impracticable, and at the same time dangerous to the administration of justice, if it were practicable, to attempt to make minute applications of the principles involved in the answers given by them to your Lordships' questions. They have, therefore, confined their answers to the statement of that which they hold to be the law upon the abstract questions proposed by your Lordships, and as they deem it unnecessary in this peculiar case to deliver their opinions seriatim, and as all concur in the same opinion, they desire me to express such their unanimous opinion to your Lordships.

The first question proposed by your Lordships is this :

D "What is the law respecting alleged crimes committed by persons afflicted with insane delusion in respect of one or more particular subjects or persons, as, for instance, where at the time of the commission of the alleged crime the accused knew he was acting contrary to law, but did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some supposed public benefit?"

E In answer to this question, assuming that your Lordships' inquiries are confined to those persons who labour under such partial delusions only, and are not in other respects insane, we are of opinion that, notwithstanding the party accused did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some public benefit, he is nevertheless punishable according to the nature of the crime committed, if he knew at the time of committing such crime that he was acting contrary to law; by which expression we understand your Lordships to mean the law of the land.

Your Lordships are pleased to inquire of us, secondly :

G "What are the proper questions to be submitted to the jury when a person alleged to be afflicted with insane delusion respecting one or more particular subjects or persons is charged with the commission of a crime (murder, for example), and insanity is set up as a defence?"

And, thirdly :

H "In what terms ought the question to be left to the jury as to the prisoner's state of mind at the time when the act was committed?"

I As these two questions appear to us to be more conveniently answered together we have to submit our opinion to be that the jurors ought to be told in all cases that every man is to be presumed to be sane and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crimes until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction, and that to establish a defence on the ground of insanity it must be clearly proved that, at the time of the committing of the act the party accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong.

The mode of putting the latter part of the question to the jury on these occasions has generally been, whether the accused at the time of doing the act knew the difference between right and wrong, which mode, though rarely, if ever, leading to any mistake with the jury, is not, as we conceive, so accurate when put generally and in the abstract, as when put with reference to the party's knowledge of right and wrong in respect to the very act with which he is charged. If the question were to be put as to the knowledge of the accused solely and exclusively with reference to the law of the land, it might tend to confound the jury, by inducing them to believe that an actual knowledge of the law of the land was essential in order to lead to a conviction, whereas the law is administered upon the principle that everyone must be taken conclusively to know it, without proof that he does know it. If the accused was conscious that the act was one which he ought not to do, and if that act was at the same time contrary to the law of the land, he is punishable; and the usual course, therefore, has been to leave the question to the jury whether the party accused had a sufficient degree of reason to know that he was doing an act that was wrong, and this course we think is correct, accompanied with such observations and explanations as the circumstances of each particular case may require.

The fourth question which your Lordships have proposed to us is this :

"If a person under an insane delusion as to existing facts commits an offence in consequence thereof, is he thereby excused?"

To this question the answer must, of course, depend on the nature of the delusion, but, making the same assumption as we did before, namely, that he labours under such partial delusion only, and is not in other respects insane, we think he must be considered in the same situation as to responsibility as if the facts with respect to which the delusion exists were real. For example, if under the influence of his delusion he supposes another man to be in the act of attempting to take away his life, and he kills that man, as he supposes, in self-defence, he would be exempt from punishment. If his delusion was that the deceased had inflicted a serious injury to his character and fortune, and he killed him in revenge for such supposed injury, he would be liable to punishment.

The question lastly proposed by your Lordships is :

"Can a medical man conversant with the disease of insanity, who never saw the prisoner previously to the trial, but who was present during the whole trial and the examination of all the witnesses, be asked his opinion as to the state of the prisoner's mind at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, or his opinion whether the prisoner was conscious at the time of doing the act that he was acting contrary to law, or whether he was labouring under any and what delusion at the time?"

In answer thereto, we state to your Lordships, that we think the medical man, under the circumstances supposed, cannot in strictness be asked his opinion in the terms above stated, because each of those questions involves the determination of the truth of the facts deposed to, which it is for the jury to decide, and the questions are not mere questions upon a matter of science, in which case such evidence is admissible. But where the facts are admitted or not disputed, and the question becomes substantially one of science only, it may be convenient to allow the question to be put in that general form, though the same cannot be insisted on as a matter of right.

LORD BROUGHAM.—The opinions of the learned judges, and the very able manner in which they have been presented to the House, deserve our best thanks. One of the learned judges has expressed his regret that these questions were not argued by counsel. Generally speaking, it is most important that in questions put for the consideration of the judges, they should have all that assistance which is afforded to them by an argument by counsel, but at the same time there can be no doubt of your Lordships' right to put, in this way, abstract questions of law to the judges, the answer to which might be necessary to your Lordships in your legislative capacity. There is a precedent for this course in the memorable instance of Mr. Fox's Bill on the law of libel, where, before passing the Bill, this

A House called on the judges to give their opinions on what was the law as it then existed.

B LORD CAMPBELL.—I cannot avoid expressing my satisfaction that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack carried into effect his desire to put these questions to the judges. It was most fit that the opinions of the judges should be asked on these matters, the settling of which is not a mere matter of speculation, for your Lordships may be called on, in your legislative capacity, to change the law, and, before doing so, it is proper that you should be satisfied beyond doubt what the law really is. It is desirable to have such questions argued at the Bar, but such a course is not always practicable. Your Lordships have been reminded of one precedent for this proceeding, but there is a still more recent instance, the judges having been summoned in the case of the Canada Reserves, to express their opinions on what was then the law on that subject. The answers given by the judges are mostly highly satisfactory, and will be of the greatest use in the administration of justice.

D LORD COTTENHAM.—I fully concur with the opinion now expressed, as to the obligations we owe to the judges. It is true that they cannot be required to say what would be the construction of a Bill, not in existence as a law at the moment at which the question is put to them, but they may be called on to assist your Lordships, in declaring their opinions upon abstract questions of existing law.

E LORD WYNFORD.—I never doubted that your Lordships possess the power to call on the judges to give their opinions upon questions of existing law, proposed to them as these questions have been. I myself recollect, that when I had the honour to hold the office of Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, I communicated to the House the opinions of the judges on questions of this sort, framed with reference to the usury laws. Upon the opinion of the judges thus delivered to the House by me, a Bill was founded, and afterwards passed into a law.

F LORD LYNDBURST, L.C.—I entirely concur in the opinion given by my noble and learned friends, as to our right to have the opinions of the judges on abstract questions of existing law; and I agree that we owe our thanks to the judges, for the attention and learning with which they have answered the questions now put to them.

Conflict of Laws—Marriage—Validity—Determination by lex domicilii of parties at time of ceremony—Legitimacy—Determination by law of birthplace and parents' domicil—Real property—Title or succession—Determination by lex loci rei sitae—Status in foreign country—Recognition in England if in accordance with English law.

As a general rule the validity of a marriage is to be determined by the law of the country where the parties were domiciled at the time of the ceremony, and in most cases the legitimacy of a person is to be determined by the law of his birthplace and of his parents' domicil. To these rules, however, there is the exception that in determining questions relating to the title or succession to real property the lex loci rei sitae must always prevail.

Semble. The status of a person in a foreign country will not be recognised in England if it is of a kind which is not in accordance with English law.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Session in Scotland.

- E Sir Thomas Livingstone, Baronet, of Bedlormie, Linlithgowshire, died in 1853. His estates in Scotland were limited to heirs male "lawfully procreated." The deceased baronet left no issue, brother, or issue of a brother, except the respondent, who was the son of Sir Thomas's brother, Thurstanus Livingstone, by his second wife who was the sister of his first wife. Thurstanus and the mother of the respondent, were married in 1808 in England, where both parties were domiciled.
- F The respondent was born in 1809, his father being still domiciled in England. His mother died in 1832, and no suit to nullify the marriage on the ground that it was illegal [which it then was, such a marriage not being legalised until the Deceased Wife's Sister's Marriage Act, 1907: see now Marriage Enabling Act, 1860, s. 1] had been promoted in the ecclesiastical court. The respondent's claim as heir male was not disputed, provided he was to be deemed legitimate by the Scottish courts.
- G The appellant, Fenton, was the heir entitled to succeed if the respondent should be held illegitimate. The Court of Session held that the respondent was legitimate, and entitled to succeed to the Scottish estates. The court took the view that as no suit to nullify the marriage had been brought during the lives of his parents, an English court would be barred after the death of one of them from inquiring into the legitimacy of the respondent, and the Scottish courts were also barred from inquiring into that matter. That decision was now appealed against.

July 15, 1859. The following opinions were read.

- I LORD BROUGHAM.—This case arises out of facts which are either admitted on all hands, or are clearly proved in evidence, or are assumed, together with one proposition of law by the court below, in disposing of the matter before it, their judgment being given upon the main question on that assumption; but the evidence in the cause leaves no doubt as to the facts assumed. The question is raised between the respondent Alexander Livingstone, claiming, as lawful son of Thurstanus Livingstone, estates in Scotland, to which he asserts his right of succession as heir of entail upon the decease of his uncle Sir Thomas Livingstone, the person last in possession, and the appellant, Anne Fenton, claiming the same estates as heir of entail upon the decease of Sir Thomas Livingstone on the ground that all the preceding substitutes and heirs have failed, and this raises the question between her and the respondent, whose title she impeaches upon the ground of his father's marriage with his mother having been illegal by the law of Scotland and the issue excluded from inheritance to a Scottish estate. A

The facts either admitted or clearly proved are these. Thurstanus Livingstone married two sisters, one after the other. He was domiciled in England, his two wives were both Englishwomen, and in England the respondent was born. His mother died in 1882, and no proceedings were had for the purpose of declaring the marriage void. He contends, therefore, that he is in all respects legitimate. The only objection raised to the marriage of his parents, which took place before his birth, was that their marriage was incestuous, which, as he contends, only made it voidable, and not void, by the law as it stood before the year 1835. B C

It must be granted that the general rule is to determine the validity of a marriage by the law of the country where the parties were domiciled, and in most cases the legitimacy of a party is to be determined by the law of his birthplace and of his parents' domicil. But to this application of the lex loci contractus there are exceptions from the nature of the case in which the question arises. Thus, in deciding upon the title to real estate, the lex loci rei sitae must always prevail. D So that a person legitimate by the law of his birthplace and of the place where his parents were married, may not be regarded as legitimate to take a real estate by inheritance elsewhere. This was laid down in Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill (1), which, in some of the opinions of the learned judges below, is supposed to have been decided in consequence of a statutory provision. But the Statute of Merton is only declaratory of the common law, or rather it is a refusal to alter that law. E A person legitimated by the marriage of his parents after his birth is in Scotland and in some other countries legitimate. He is legitimus, that is factus legitimus. As to invalidate is to make invalid, so to legitimate is to make legitimate. And by the lex loci the party was legitimate to all intents and purposes in Scotland. That was so laid down in Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill (1). But when he claimed a real estate in England, he was not held legitimate to that effect, because legitimacy F by the English law requires the party to have been born in lawful marriage, while in the law of Scotland no such requisite exists. If the Scottish law had held a person legitimate, who, though born in marriage, was the issue of an incestuous marriage, or of a marriage with a second wife living, he would not have been held entitled to take a real estate in England, and perhaps have not been held legitimate to any effect, though he might have been to all intents and purposes legitimate in G the country of his birth, and of his parents' domicil and marriage.

Was the marriage of the respondent's parents such that the law of Scotland could recognise its validity in dealing with the rights of the issue of it to take real estate by inheritance? First of all, let us consider if it was legal in the country where contracted and where the parties had their domicil. It was clearly illegal by the law of England. That law treated it as incestuous [Legitimation per subsequens matrimonium was recognised by the Legitimacy Act, 1926, s. 1 (1). H Section 1 (2) which created an exception to the general provision was repealed by the Legitimacy Act, 1959, s. 1 (1)]. By the rules of the ecclesiastical courts, which alone had cognisance of this objection to a marriage, it could not be questioned except during the lives of both husband and wife. But it was illegal, and if questioned while both parties were alive, the marriage must have been declared I void ab initio. And why? Because it was contrary to law. The circumstance of one party to it having died before this dispute arose, and before it was questioned, did not make the marriage legal, though it precluded the possibility of setting it aside, and the son was issue not of a lawful marriage but of a marriage which could not be questioned with effect, according to the rules of the ecclesiastical courts. The temporal courts held the same principles on this subject as the ecclesiastical, and would act with them if they could entertain the question. Indeed, the Marriage Act, 1885 (commonly called Lord Lyndhurst's Act) [repealed by Marriage Act,

A 1949], proceeds upon the ground that marriages within the forbidden degrees of affinity are void if questioned—void because illegal—and enacts that henceforth they shall be ipso facto void and not voidable by any proceedings.

It is unnecessary to inquire whether a marriage so void if questioned in England before the Act, but prevented from being questioned by the course of procedure in the English courts, could be questioned in Scotland, if the Scottish and English law differed upon the grounds of the objection, because the Scottish law is much more stringent on the subject than the English, holding all marriages within the forbidden degrees, not only to be incestuous, but also to be severely punishable, even capitally. The Court of Justiciary proceeded upon this view a few years ago during the presidency of LORD JUSTICE GENERAL BOYLE, when the late Lord Justice Clerk, and LORDS MACKENZIE, MONCRIEFF, COCKBURN and WOOD were upon the Bench (Lord Advocate v. Stewart and Wallace (15)). They sentenced the prisoners (Stewart and Wallace) to fourteen years' transportation, the Lord Advocate having restricted the libel from the capital part. This was the case of marriage of uncle and niece, but there is by law no difference whatever between consanguinity and affinity in this respect. If the lex loci contractus were to prevail absolutely, and a marriage good in a country where it took place, and where the party claiming under it was born, were to make that party inheritable in Scotland, then uncle and niece marrying in a foreign country with papal dispensation, their issue might claim to take a Scottish estate and Scottish honours—although, had the marriage been contracted in Scotland, the parties might have been capitally convicted and sentenced to death, or sentenced to transportation with consent of the public prosecutor, as in the case of Stewart and Wallace. It is impossible that such can be the law. The claimant might, as in this case, call a marriage what the law calls a crime—conjugium vocat, hoc praetexit nomine culpam.

The respondent cannot be held the heir male lawfully procreate by parties whose marriage was an offence severely punishable by the law of Scotland, and "heir male," even without the words "lawfully procreate," must be intended as if these words were added, because "heir" means the issue lawfully procreated, and it is wholly impossible to separate the notion of valid marriage from the question of legitimate issue, which the heir must be—valid marriage either before the birth, or by the Scottish law it may be after the birth—but valid marriage in either case. It is contended that marriage legal in the country where it takes place must be held valid everywhere, even in countries where, the law being different, the marriage would be invalid.

G The case is referred to of Scottish marriages between parties coming from England to escape the requirements of the English law, and it is argued that their marriage, which would have been illegal in England, is valid for English purposes because good in Scotland. But first, the marriage in those cases is not such as the English law prohibits. It is only one requiring in England certain things not necessary to give it validity in Scotland. And, next, the validity of a Scottish marriage in these circumstances has never been decided absolutely and without qualification. Compton v. Bearcroft (2) originally decided in the Court of Arches, and afterwards before the delegates, first determined that Scottish runaway marriages were valid in England, contrary to LORD MANSFIELD's pretty plainly indicated opinion; and in Ilderton v. Ilderton (3), where, in answer to a claim of dower out of an English estate, ne unques accouple was pleaded, the discussion arose upon a question of pleading, Compton v. Bearcroft (2) being taken as having decided the point of the Scottish marriage being valid in England, and the debate arose on two questions—whether the replication was well in concluding to the country, and whether a venue should not have been laid. It is remarkable that SIR GEORGE HAY, who decided Compton v. Bearcroft (2), states in Harford v. Morris (4) (2 Hag. Con. at p. 430), as SIR WILLIAM WYNNE does in Middleton v. Janverin (5) (ibid. at p. 444), that the decision was: "A Scottish marriage is valid in England if there be nothing in it contrary to the law of England." That is a very material qualification. If the parties had been uncle and niece, and if the law of Scotland, instead of reprobating and punishing such a marriage, had allowed it like that of many countries acknowledging the power of a papal dispensation in which such marriages are of daily occurrence, surely no one can doubt that the decision of SIR GEORGE HAY, affirmed by the delegates, would have been the other way, and that the affirmative issue in Ilderton v. Ilderton (3), of ne unques accouple in loyal matrimonie would not have been held sustained by the evidence of a marriage which the law of England prohibits and could in no sense be called loyal matrimonie. A B

Much more clearly must the respondent in Scotland fail in his defence to the declaration of bastardy, when he had to prove himself the issue of a lawful marriage, and the marriage is by the law held prohibited—nay, is even severely punishable. It must be observed that the authorities upon the conflict of laws qualify the admission of a foreign law much as SIR GEORGE HAY does in the case of Scottish marriage. HUBER, the authority most often cited, adds to the statement of admission, “quatenus nihil potestati aut juri alterius imperantis ejusque civium praejudicetur,” and he refers to incest as one example of the admission being excluded. Other writers take the same view which LITTLEDALE, J., in Doe d. Birt-whistle v. Vardill (1) (5 B. & C. at p. 455), fully adopts. C

There are other cases of marriage prohibited by the law of Scotland. Thus, by the Act of 1600, on the dissolution of marriage for adultery, the intermarriage of the adulterer and the adulteress is prohibited. Suppose such a marriage contracted in England, where by our law it would not be invalid, can it be doubted that the issue of it claiming an estate in Scotland would be considered illegitimate? This is the very case put in Edmonstone v. Edmonstone (6), by a most learned judge—a person, too, of very enlarged views upon general subjects as well as law —LORD GLENLEE, and he held that the son of such a second marriage would not exclude a daughter of the first and lawful marriage. Another instance may be given arising from the difference between the laws of the two countries on the indissolubility of the contract. In England, until very lately [i.e., the passing of the first Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857], it was impossible to dissolve a marriage originally valid by any legal proceeding—an Act of Parliament alone could have this operation. In Scotland a divorce could be obtained by sentence of the court. If an English marriage were thus dissolved in Scotland, and one of the parties contracted a second marriage in Scotland during the other's life, it would be perfectly valid in Scotland, but, if the issue claimed an English estate, the validity of the divorce would come in question in order to determine the validity of the second marriage, which would probably be held (I do not say that it has ever been held) G to be governed by R. v. Lolley (7).

Great reliance was placed on the respondent's part, and by some of the learned judges below, upon the proposition that status acquired in one country follows a person everywhere. It is said sicut umbra personam sequitur. Nothing can be more a case of status than liberty and slavery, yet when a man from a country where he was by law held in slavery comes to England or Scotland, the light of liberty chases away the shadow. He is in all respects free as regards his person and his property, though in the place he came from he was a mere chattel, and whatever he earned or became possessed of in any way while there belonged to his master. That master could not recover it in our courts, since the principles which were laid down in Sommerset's Case (8) in England, and in Knight v. Wedderburn (9) in Scotland somewhat earlier. LITTLEDALE, J., says: H

“The rule that a personal status accompanies a man everywhere is admitted to have this qualification, that it does not militate against the law of the country where the consequences of that status are sought to be enforced.” I

I, therefore, humbly move your Lordships to give judgment for the appellant in this case.

LORD CRANWORTH.—The question for decision in this case is whether Alexander Livingstone, the respondent, is, according to the terms of the deed of entail

A of Dec. 17, 1702, heir male lawfully procreate of the body of Alexander Livingstone, the entailor. It is admitted that he is so if he is heir male of the body of Thurstanus Livingstone who died in 1839. It must be taken as established beyond all controversy that Thurstanus was for above forty years prior and up to his decease domiciled in England; that in 1797, being so domiciled, he married in England Susannah Brown, a widow, and that she died in 1806 without leaving any issue by him; that in 1808 Thurstanus married in England Catherine Ann Dupuis, an Englishwoman, being a sister of Susannah his first wife, and by her, who died in 1832, had issue the respondent, his eldest son, who was born in 1809. No proceedings were ever taken in the ecclesiastical courts in England to declare void the marriage of Thurstanus with Catherine Ann Dupuis, and the point for decision is whether in these circumstances the respondent, as the eldest son of Thurstanus, is the heir male of his body, and so heir male of the body of Alexander the entailor in 1702. The case was considered by the Court of Session on the assumption that by the law of Scotland the marriage of a widower and the sister of his deceased wife is incest under the Scottish statute of 1567, and that the parties living together in Scotland as man and wife, under such a marriage, would be committing a capital offence, that the marriage would be void, and that the issue of such a connection would be illegitimate, and so incapable of inheriting as heirs of entail. The argument at the Bar of this House proceeded on the same hypothesis, it being understood that if in the judgment of your Lordships the case should turn on the question whether the respondent could succeed as heir of the body of the entailor, assuming the law of Scotland to be the law which is to govern the decision, then the case must be remitted back to the Court of Session to be reconsidered by them. Their decision proceeded on the ground that as the marriage took place in England between parties domiciled there, the law of England must decide whether the marriage was or was not valid, and whether the issue of that marriage was or was not capable of inheriting as heir of the body of his parents lawfully procreate. They came to the conclusion that by the law of England the marriage was valid, and that the respondent was the eldest son of that marriage lawfully procreate, and, therefore, was entitled to succeed to the lands in question.

After giving to this subject my best attention, I have come, though not without some fluctuation of opinion, to the conclusion that the Court of Session was wrong in treating this marriage as a valid marriage by the law of England, and in treating the respondent as the legitimate son of Thurstanus for the purpose of the Scottish succession. The Act prohibiting marriage within the prohibited degrees, 25 Hen. 8, c. 22, s. 4 [repealed by the now repealed Marriage Act, 1536], expressly enacts that no man shall marry his wife's sister, and in case of any marriage being contracted in violation of that prohibition, the ecclesiastical court, with whom, in this country, jurisdiction on these subjects exclusively rested, would declare any such marriage to be void. It is true that, by the construction put upon the statute, no inquiry as to the validity of marriage could be instituted by the ecclesiastical court after the marriage had come to an end by the death of one of the parties. So that, inasmuch as the temporal courts had no jurisdiction, the issue would succeed to the estate of a deceased parent as his or her heir if no proceedings had been taken in the lifetime of both parents to declare the marriage void, for it must be observed that the court had no authority to interfere actively to dissolve any marriage validly contracted, but only to declare what the law was as to the alleged marriage—the marriage de facto as it was called—to declare that there never was any marriage—to declare it esse et fuisse invalidum ab initio. That such a result must have followed a proceeding in the ecclesiastical court, calling in question the second marriage of Thurstanus, is a matter which can admit of no doubt. But if so, how can the true character of the marriage be altered by the accident of whether any third person did or did not think it worth his while to call it in question? It is not the proceeding in the ecclesiastical court which made such a marriage void. No court in this country could affect by its decree a valid marriage. Its jurisdiction was only of a declaratory nature, that is, to declare the legal invalidity of an act already complete, but which was not what it purported to be—a marriage. The ground on which alone such a declaration could be made was that which must have been equally true whether such a declaration was or was not made, namely, the original invalidity of the marriage. A

I, therefore, think, if the case turns on the mere question whether the second marriage of Thurstanus was a valid marriage by the law of England, that it was not so, and, consequently, that the respondent on this hypothesis fails to make out that he is the heir male of the body of the entailor. But it was urged that the question is one depending, not directly on the question of the validity of the marriage, but on the question of the legitimacy of the respondent, and that, inasmuch as he is certainly legitimate in England, therefore, he is so everywhere; that his status of legitimacy is established conclusively all over the world; and, therefore, in Scotland by the fact of his legitimacy in England, the place of his domicile. But I think there is a fallacy in this reasoning. The point to be established is whether he is the heir male lawfully procreate of the body of Alexander the entailor—and this, as I have already stated, depends on the question whether he is the lawful son of Thurstanus. If, as I think, the marriage of his parents was not a good marriage in England, where they were domiciled and were married, he could not be their legitimate child in the view of a Scottish court. The rule of English law, which gives to the child of an invalid marriage the status of legitimacy, unless the marriage is called in question before the ecclesiastical court cannot be binding beyond its own territory. Such a child is in the same position in the point of status as a child clearly illegitimate born in this country would be if an Act of Parliament were passed declaring that he should be deemed to be legitimate to all intents and purposes: the legitimacy so constituted would have no effect beyond the limits of the country so legislating, so far, at all events, as relates to the succession to real estates. In such cases, even supposing the law of the domicile to govern, the question is not whether the claimant is legitimate in the country of his birth or his domicile, but whether he is legitimate by reason of his being the issue of a lawful marriage. B C D E F

I have hitherto considered the case on the assumption that the Scottish courts ought to be guided by the law of England as to the marriage of Thurstanus. But this is not, as I think, a true view of the case. We must assume, as was assumed by the Court of Session for the purpose of this case, that by the law of Scotland the alleged marriage of Thurstanus was, by Scottish law, a mere nullity, that it was a criminal connection contrary to the laws of God and the law of the land, and that the parties, if they had been in Scotland, would have been liable to suffer death as the penalty of their offence. Admitting that prima facie, in inquiring whether a marriage is or is not valid, we must look to the law of the place where it has been contracted, or where the parties were domiciled, that is a rule which must be received with some qualifications. Where it has been the policy of the law of any country to prohibit marriage in any particular circumstances, the prohibition attaches on the subjects of that country wherever they may go. It was on this principle that the Sussex Peerage Case (10) was decided. The marriage there was clearly valid according to the laws of the country where it was contracted, but it was held in this House that the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, having prescribed certain steps, by which alone the descendants of King George II could contract marriage, the laws of this country would prevail against the law of the place where the marriage was contracted, and I can conceive no case to which this principle is more clearly applicable than a case where the law makes void marriages of a particular description as being contrary to the express command of the Almighty, and punishes capitally those who contract them. It is true that in the Sussex Peerage Case (10), the parties who contracted marriage at Rome were domiciled in England, but I do not think that the opinion of the judges, delivered by TINDAL, C.J., was affected by that circumstance. The ground of that opinion was that the prohibition caused a personal disqualification attaching on one of the parties to G H I

A the contract, from which he could never free himself wherever he might be. The same principle is applicable here. The law of Scotland must be taken as having positively prohibited Thurstanus from marrying Catherine Anne Dupuis, and that prohibition, as I think, was fixed on him absolutely and indelibly, wherever he might be domiciled.

The present case, though not the same as that of Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill (1), bears a close resemblance to it. There the plaintiff was undoubtedly the legitimate son of his parents in the country where he was born and domiciled, but it was the policy and law of this country, in which he claimed to succeed to a real estate, that no one should be deemed to sustain the character of son and heir unless he was born after the marriage of his parents, and as the claimant there was born before marriage, he was held to be incapable of inheriting real estate here: the lex loci rei sitae prevailed. So in the present case, the Scottish law expressly enacts that no one shall marry his first wife's sister, and that, if he does, the marriage is void and the children are bastards (for this we must, in the present case at least, assume to be the law of Scotland), and I think that, reasoning by analogy from Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill (1), that is a law which must be taken to operate whatever may be the law of the country where the marriage is contracted or the parties are domiciled. On these grounds I concur with my noble and learned friend in thinking that the Court of Session was wrong, and, according to the arrangement made on the argument below, the case must now be remitted back.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—The question which your Lordships have to decide arose on a competition for the succession to the entailed estate of Bedlormie. The entail was made in 1702. The estate descended, according to the terms of that entail, on Sir Thomas Livingstone, who died in 1853 without issue. He had several brothers, all of whom died before him without issue, except one, named Thurstanus, who left a son—the respondent; and the right of that son to succeed to the estate as nearest and lawful heir male of tailzie and provision of Sir Thomas Livingstone, is the question in this case. This question was raised on a petition presented by the respondent Alexander Livingstone to the sheriff of Chancery. Another petition was presented by Mrs. Fenton, the eldest surviving sister under the Service of Heirs (Scotland) Act, 1847. The cause was advocated into the Court of Session, and afterwards Mrs. Fenton brought an action of declarator of bastardy against the respondent, which raised the question not merely of his being the lawful child of Thurstanus, but also that he was not lawfully procreated, and was not entitled to succeed as heir to Sir Thomas Livingstone by virtue of the tailzie. The case on the part of the respondent was that he was born in England in 1809, and that his father Thurstanus was domiciled in that kingdom, married there in August, 1808, when so domiciled, to his mother, and died in December, 1839. She died in 1832.

H On the part of the appellant it was alleged that Thurstanus had, previously to the marriage with the respondent's mother, married her sister, who died in 1806, and it was contended that this second marriage was incestuous and void, and the issue, therefore, illegitimate and incapable of succession to a Scottish estate. Proof was gone into by both parties at great length—on the part of the respondents to prove the domicile of Thurstanus in England at the time of his marriage and his own birth; on the part of the appellant to establish the fact that the mother of the respondent was the sister of Thurstanus's first wife. The Lord Ordinary was satisfied that both the domicile and relationship were established. On the hearing of this appeal both these questions were again brought forward, particularly that of domicile, at some length, but your Lordships have already intimated an opinion that the evidence of both were quite satisfactory, and it is unnecessary to say anything more as to the facts of the case. The question of law which arises upon them is most important. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the legitimacy of the respondent was to be decided according to the law of his domicile; that by the law of England (his domicile) his legitimacy could not be disputed; and his interlocutor referred to an annexed note in which his reasons are very fully and ably stated, and among them he intimates a doubt whether the marriage with a wife's sister was expressly prohibited by divine law or to be capitally punishable under the Scottish law (statute 1567, c. 14), if it had taken place in Scotland. Upon a reclaiming note to the First Division of the Court of Session, the court adhered to the interlocutor, but deleted the part which referred to the reasons, and the judges of the Court of Session in delivering their opinions proceeded upon the assumption that such a marriage entered into between parties domiciled in Scotland would, according to the law of that country, be struck at by the statute 1567, c. 14 and c. 15, and that the issue of that marriage would be illegitimate. But they all were of opinion that the question of legitimacy was to be determined by the law of the country of the respondent's domicile and that by the law of England he would be held to be legitimate. I have fully considered the very able arguments of the learned judges and those that were urged at your Lordships' Bar, and with the greatest respect for the judges I am satisfied that they have come to wrong conclusions, and, therefore, advise your Lordships to reverse the judgment of the Court of Session.

In order to decide the very important question in this case we must inquire, first, assuming the marriage of the claimant's parents to have been lawful, and himself to have been legitimate by the law of England, whether he is entitled to succeed to this Scottish estate; secondly, if the question is to be decided by the law of domicile (England), was this marriage legal so as to make the issue of it legitimate? It must be considered as established that the law of a man's domicile regulates his rights to personal property wherever situate, on the acknowledged principle of mobilia sequuntur personam, and, therefore, the succession to his effects takes place according to the law of the place where he is domiciled at the time of his death, in the cases of intestacy or testacy. It is now fully and perfectly settled by our law that the law of the domicile regulates the distribution of personal estate in the former case, and the form of the will in the latter. The law of the domicile regulates also the personal qualities which take effect from birth, such as legitimacy or illegitimacy, or absolutely as to the succession of personal property: STORY ON THE CONFLICT OF LAWS, 481; but subject to a qualification as to realty, to be afterwards explained, or the qualities which arise after birth, such as majority and minority. The laws of the State affecting the personal status of its subjects travel with them wherever they go, and attach to them in whatever country they are resident: WHEATON, chap. 11, p. 122.

I do not stop to inquire whether the expression that the laws of foreign countries where they have an extra-territorial operation are said to owe it to the comity of nations is the best mode of expression: it certainly is in common use, and is perfectly intelligible. STORY, in s. 38, says:

"There is not only no impropriety in the use of the phrase 'comity of nations,' but it is the most appropriate phrase to express the true foundation and extent of the obligation of the laws of one nation within the territories of another. It is derived altogether from the voluntary consent of the latter, and is inadmissible when it is contrary to its known policy or prejudicial to its interests."

The principle is well explained by HUBER in his third proposition on the subject of the CONFLICT OF LAWS. To the same effect PRESIDENT BOHIER expresses himself in his OBSERVATIONS SUR LA COUTUME DE BOURGOYNE, c. 23, ss. 62 and 63, p. 457 (WHEATON'S ELEMENTS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW, c. 2, p. 115):

"This effect given to foreign laws is founded on a kind of comity of the law of nations, by which different people have tacitly agreed that they shall apply, whenever it is required by equity and common utility, provided they do not contravene any prohibitory enactment."

But in respect to immovable property the rule is different. Though there have been questions, perhaps not difficult to decide, as to the capacity to convey and

- A the form of conveyance where the country of the domicile and that of the estate differ, it is fully established that the law of the country in which the property is situated governs exclusively as to the tenure, the title, and the descent of such property: WHEATON'S ELEMENTS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW, part 2, c. 2, p. 116; 4 BURGE, COMMENTARIES ON COLONIAL AND FOREIGN LAWS, p. 581. Therefore, lands in each country descend to those who are heirs by the laws of that country; to all children equally where the custom of gavelkind prevails [descent by the custom of gavelkind was abolished by the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 45 (1) (a)], or as it is in France, where all share equally a certain part, or in Austria where all share the whole in certain proportions. That rule must prevail, though a different rule regulates the descent in the country of the domicile of the deceased owner. If in the country where the lands are situate the youngest son takes [e.g., where the custom of borough english prevailed: abolished by Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 45 (1) (a)], it matters not that the eldest is entitled in the country of the domicile. If the eldest legitimate son, or the eldest son lawfully procreated, is to succeed by the lex loci rei sitae, he alone can succeed who is legitimate or lawfully procreated according to the law of that place. But when the claimant is not a native of that place, the law gives effect by the comity of nations to the law of his domicile where he was born, and if legitimate and born of a lawful marriage there, he would be legitimate according to the lex loci, with the qualification afterwards noticed. If not legitimate according to the law of his domicile, he could not succeed, even though he would under the same circumstances be legitimate and entitled to succeed if born in the country rei sitae, as appears by Munro v. Saunders (11); and even though legitimate by the law of his domicile when born before marriage, he could not succeed to real estates if illegitimate by the law of the place where the land is situated, as was decided in that case after the most deliberate consideration. It matters not whether that law was by a special statute or the common law of the land.

There is no doubt, however, that the law forbidding the antenatus to succeed in England was part of the common law, and the Statute of Merton was in affirmation of it, or, more correctly speaking, a refusal to vary it. The reasoning in that case applies in every respect to this—a claimant born after a marriage, valid according to the law of the domicile, would be prima facie entitled to succeed to the estate. As to the fact of the marriage, LORD STOWELL in Lady Herbert v. Lord Herbert (12) says (2 Hag. Con. at p. 271):

- G “It is the established principle that every marriage is to be universally recognised which is valid according to the law of the place where it was had, whatever that law may be.”

- But if, using the language of HUBER, the adoption of the law of the domicile would occasion a prejudice to the rights of other States and their citizens; or if, using the language of BOHIER, they contravene a prohibitory enactment, the comity of nations would not require or authorise their adoption. If such a marriage, good according to the law of domicile, were contrary to their notions of religion and morality, it would be impossible to contend that it ought to be adopted by them, and the issue of that marriage deemed legitimate for the purpose of succession to real estate. Supposing the law of the domicile considered the eldest natural son to be legitimate, and to be entitled to his father's property, real and personal, it could not for a moment be contended that he could succeed to a Scottish estate; or suppose that polygamy was permitted in the country of domicile, it could not be contended that the son of a second wife should be heir in Scotland to real property after the death of the first without children. Such a marriage would be contrary to the moral and religious and political institutions of that country, and is forbidden by the law of Scotland in Scotland itself under severe sanctions, the confiscation of goods, the piercing of the tongue and infamy: statute 1551, c. 19.
- I

Is there not precisely the same objection, or rather more, to this marriage of which the claimant is the issue, as being contrary to the moral and religious institutions of the Scots, for it is characterised by the law as "vile, filthy and abominable in the presence of God." It is forbidden by much more severe sanctions, and if it had taken place in Scotland would be punishable by death. The case is precisely the same, as to its legality, as if, instead of being the marriage of a husband with his deceased wife's sister, it was a marriage in a foreign country by a man with his sister, daughter or mother, and can anyone doubt that such a marriage would never be tolerated and that the issue would not be deemed illegitimate? STORY, J., in s. 114 of the CONFLICT OF LAWS, states that marriages involving polygamy and incest could not be recognised in any Christian country, but he distinguishes in the case of incest, confining the doctrine to such marriages as are by the general consent of all Christendom incestuous. This distinction has been disapproved of with reason by SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL in Brook v. Brook (13). One cannot see how any country can be called on to give effect to a marriage, as to real estates within its limits, which is by its own law deemed incestuous and void. I think, therefore, that this case falls within the exceptions allowed in the rule as to adopting the laws of a foreign State as to the personal status in the question of heirship. If the case is to turn on this point the respondent ought to have the option, if he thinks fit to exercise it, of having the case remitted for the purpose of considering whether the assumption as to the law of Scotland forbidding the marriage of the sister of a deceased wife is correct, though I cannot feel any doubt whatever on that question. A B C D

The second question for consideration is whether, supposing the legitimacy of the respondent is to be decided by the law of domicile only, the marriage was valid, so as to make the issue of it legitimate according to that law. My opinion is that by the law of England the marriage of a widower with his deceased wife's sister was always as illegal and invalid as a marriage with a sister, daughter, or mother was. This appears to be clear by the decision in R. v. Chadwick (14), in which the several statutes and authorities prior to Lord Lyndhurst's Act [Marriage Act, 1835] are commented upon and considered. It was always deemed as being within the prohibited and Levitical degrees. But from the peculiarity that the question of the validity of marriage with reference to the objection of being within the Levitical degrees was matter of ecclesiastical cognisance, and cognisable in the spiritual court alone, it could not be questioned after the death of either party, for it could not be dissolved by the court then as death had already dissolved it, nor could the issue be bastardised, though the survivor might be visited with ecclesiastical censures. But the marriage was still an unlawful and forbidden marriage, and the issue really was born illegitimate, though the validity of the marriage, and the legitimacy of the issue could not be questioned in the country of domicile by reason of the rules of the peculiar law which made these matters cognisable in one tribunal only in that country. The marriage would be good in one sense, because it could not be set aside, and the issue would be legitimate in that sense, because there were no means provided by the English law to deprive them of the rights belonging to legitimate issue, but such marriages were all forbidden at the time of contracting them—all illegal—all capable of being set aside as void ab initio, on account of their illegality, and the comity of nations cannot require them to be valid in another country where there exists no means of setting them aside. Suppose the succession had opened in the lifetime of both parents, as it would have done if the estate had been settled on the eldest son of Thurstanus on the death of Sir Thomas Livingstone, and not on Thurstanus himself, and he and his wife were both alive, would that son have been deemed legitimate? If, as has been argued, the Scottish court had written to the English court requesting them to certify what was the law, or if the law had been proved by English advocates, it would unquestionably have been stated that the marriage was illegal and might be set aside, because it was ab initio void on the ground of its illegality. Could the Scottish court, under those circumstances, give effect to that marriage, and allow the issue to be legitimate and to succeed to a Scottish estate? Could E F G H I

A the legitimacy, if it did not exist then, be afterwards created by the omission to set aside the marriage in the lifetime of both parents?

Upon these grounds I think that the respondent had not any right to the estate even if his legitimacy was to be determined by the law of the country of his domicile.

B LORD CHELMSFORD.—The question in this case is whether the respondent is entitled to be served as nearest and lawful heir male of tailzie and provision in special of Sir Thomas Livingstone in the lands of Bedlormie, or whether by the failure of heirs male of his body, and also of heirs male of Alexander Livingstone the entailor, the appellant is his nearest heir.

C The respondent is the son of a second marriage of Thurstanus Livingstone with his first wife's sister, and, if legitimate, would be indisputably the nearest son and lawful heir male. The case in the Court of Session was argued and decided upon the assumption that the marriage, of which the respondent was the issue, if it had taken place in Scotland, would have been incestuous and void, and would have subjected the parties to capital punishment under the statute law of that country. This, however, must not be considered to have been absolutely decided to be the law of Scotland, but merely to have been taken for granted for the purpose of the argument. The only question which was raised and determined was that the parents of the respondent, being both of them domiciled in England at the time of the respondent's birth, the marriage upon the death of the parents became irrevocable in England, and consequently the legitimacy of the respondent having been established there for all purposes, the personal status attached upon him as E an inseparable incident, and accompanied him wherever he went, and consequently determined his claim to be regarded in Scotland as heir male lawfully procreated under the deed of tailzie and provision in question. In considering the case, two circumstances must throughout be borne in mind. First, that the marriage of the parents of the respondent is to be regarded not only as having been void, but as being a criminal act in Scotland; secondly, the title of the respondent depends upon F his answering a description contained in an instrument relating to real property in that country.

The marriage of the parents of the respondent having taken place prior to 1835, it is necessary to consider what was the law of England with respect to a marriage with a deceased wife's sister before the Marriage Act of that year. I think it cannot properly be questioned that such a marriage was void ab initio. There is a G well-known maxim of our law, quod ab initio non valet in tractu temporis non convalescit. This rule would have had its full force and operation in these marriages if it had not been for the interference of the temporal courts with the proceedings of the ecclesiastical courts after the death of one of the parents. This jurisdiction of the temporal courts appears to have been exercised in favour of the issue of the marriage which they had just protected from being bastardised by H preventing the ecclesiastical courts from declaring the marriage to have been void which had been already dissolved by death. It is to be observed, as my noble and learned friend LORD CRANWORTH has stated, that in these cases the ecclesiastical courts pronounced no decree of divorce, but merely made a declaration of the nullity of the marriage, and the temporal courts only restrained the ecclesiastical courts from making this declaration at a time when it could have no practical effect upon the marriage itself and when its only operation would be to bastardise I the issue. This is not unimportant as showing that the question of the original validity of the marriage was not at all touched by the temporal courts, thus disabling the ecclesiastical courts from pronouncing a declaration respecting it, and that the temporal courts did not by their interposition profess to deal in any way with the validity or invalidity of the marriage itself is shown by their leaving the ecclesiastical courts at liberty to proceed to punish the surviving party for incest—a power which, according to the opinion of SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST, continues even as to marriages protected by the Act of 1835.

The respondent's condition, therefore, in England was this. He was the offspring of a marriage which was incestuous and void, but of a marriage which, by the course of events, had become irrevocable. Therefore, by the law of the country of his domicil, his legitimacy was established, because it could not be impeached. He had, therefore, a personal status of legitimacy which by the course of events had become virtually absolute in this country, and it may be conceded that this would determine his rights in all other countries if not opposed by any peculiar laws or views of morality or religion regulating the subjects of marriage and succession in those countries. But I cannot think the status of legitimacy in the country of domicil can be regarded as being more than a condition relative to the laws and institutions of that country, and that it is necessarily of universal efficacy. Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill (1) is an authority the other way. There was no doubt in that case that the plaintiff in the ejectment was a legitimate child according to the law of Scotland where his parents were domiciled, but the character of legitimacy was not allowed to prevail in England where he was claiming lands as heir to his father.

It seems to have been assumed throughout this argument before your Lordships that, if the claim in this case had been to moveable property, the respondent would have succeeded, but I am not disposed, without further consideration, to concede that if the marriage is regarded in Scotland as an incestuous marriage, and it had become necessary, in order to make out the title to be next-of-kin, to prove such a marriage, that result would have followed. It is, however, unnecessary to consider that question, as we are dealing with a different description of property. The respondent contends that, although this is a case of real property and of lawful issue generally, or of lawful issue according to a particular description in a deed of tailzie, yet that the status of legitimacy being established by the indissolubility of the marriage in England, the law of Scotland will not go back and inquire into the circumstances of the marriage, but, having ascertained that it cannot now be impeached according to the lex loci contractus, it will retire and put no further questions. This is grounded on SIR WILLIAM SCOTT's judgment in Dalrymple v. Dalrymple (16). That was a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights, in which a question was raised in answer as to the validity of a marriage in Scotland, per verba de presenti, without religious celebration. This, however, like every other contract, was to be determined by the lex loci. But, suppose the contract of marriage in that case had been one which the law of England repudiated on the grounds of immorality, I apprehend the English court would not have accepted the response of the Scottish law and submissively acquiesced in it by sanctioning such a contract. This is clearly the opinion of CRESSWELL, J., and also of STUART, V.-C., in Brook v. Brook (13), with which I agree.

STOREY, J., in considering the cases where marriages celebrated according to the lex loci will be recognised in other countries, admits the exception of marriages positively prohibited by the public law of a country from motives of policy or from considerations of morality or religion. But when he comes to the question of incestuous marriages, he says (s. 114):

"Care must be taken to confine the doctrine to such cases as by the general consent of all Christendom are deemed incestuous."

But surely this must be incorrect. No country can be bound in a case of this kind to wait and collect the opinions of all Christendom before it can act upon its own views of morality or religion. An incestuous marriage is one which, in the eyes of the nation which regards it in that light, is an offence against the laws of God as well as against its own laws, and it cannot be expected to tolerate such a marriage when it becomes the proper subject of its jurisdiction, whatever views may be entertained upon it by other countries, as to which it ought not to permit itself to inquire. Nor can it in such a case pay any deference to the rules of proceeding of another country, which, upon views of convenience or forbearance

A of its own, will not permit, after a certain event, a marriage which even that country holds to be void in its nature and essence to be avoided.

If the Scottish courts were to put any question to the English courts in this case, it would be this: What do you hold as to the original validity of such a marriage? The question cannot properly be regarded as it now stands when time and accident have rendered that which was essentially bad virtually good by protecting it from being assailed. But the question is: What answer would the courts of England have returned immediately upon the marriage or upon the birth of the respondent, or, it may be added, at any time during the lives of both the parents? The answer to that question would not have been, that the marriage was good and valid until it was impeached, but that it was void and liable to be proved to be so during the lives of the parties to it. It appears to me to be a mistake to suppose that in this case the Scottish courts will put any question at all to the English courts. The question of legitimacy having relation to real estate is a question which each country will answer for itself, and will not ask the aid of another country to determine it. That this is the rule of all countries with respect to the title to real property appears from the passages in the jurists cited in the course of the argument, and is established by the case to which such frequent reference has been made, that of Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill (1). The Court of Session, therefore, ought in this case to have refused to hear the English law declaring legitimate a person whom, from being the offspring of an incestuous and criminal marriage, they would themselves have pronounced to be illegitimate, and upon the assumption on which the argument proceeded they ought to have held that the respondent was not the lawful heir male of tailzie and provision of Sir Thomas Livingstone. On these grounds I agree with my noble and learned friends that the Court of Session was wrong, and that the interlocutor must be reversed.

Appeal allowed.

Company—Director—Duty of director—Promotion of interests of company—Prohibition entering into contract on behalf of company with himself or firm or company of which he is a member—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict., c. 16), s. 86.

I

It is the duty of a director of a company so to act as best to promote the interests of the company. That duty is of a fiduciary character, and no one who has such duties to discharge can be allowed to enter into engagements in which he has, or can have, a personal interest which conflicts, or possibly may conflict, with the interests of the company. A director, therefore, is precluded from entering on behalf of the company into a contract with himself or with a firm or company of which he is a member, and so strictly is this principle adhered to that no question can be raised as to the fairness or unfairness of a contract so entered into. The application of the principle is not affected by s. 86 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 [3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 311], which provides that if a director "be either directly or indirectly concerned in any contract with the company, or participate in any manner in the profits of any work to be done for the company . . . the office of such director shall become vacant." A

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Session in an action brought by the respondents, Blaikie Brothers, ironfounders and engineers at Aberdeen, against the appellants, the Aberdeen Rail. Co., for specific performance of a contract to accept iron chairs and, alternatively, for damages for breach of contract in not accepting part of the chairs. H

The respondents in their summons set forth the grounds of action and relief in substance as follows. Alexander Gibb, a civil engineer, acting as resident engineer for and on behalf of the Aberdeen Rail. Co., having prepared a specification of chairs required for the permanent road of the railway, and having on or about Jan. 19, 1846, being the date of the specification, communicated the same to John Blaikie the youngest, one of the partners of the firm of Blaikie Brothers, with a view to the respondents contracting for the manufacture and supply of the chairs, John Blaikie, the youngest, on Feb. 6, 1846, addressed an offer to Alexander Gibb to furnish the chairs for the railway, agreeably to the plan and specifications, to be delivered at Aberdeen at the price of £8 10s. per ton. On the same day A. Gibb, acting for and on behalf of the railway company, addressed to John Blaikie, the youngest, on behalf of the respondents, the following acceptance of the said offer: I

A "As authorised by the directors of the Aberdeen Rail. Co., I hereby accept your offer for supplying the chairs for the permanent road of the Aberdeen Railway, at the rate of £8 10s. per ton, delivered at Aberdeen, the chairs to be supplied in every respect of the quality and dimensions stated in the specification of date Jan. 19 last, signed by me, and the quantity to be performed, and to which this acceptance is meant to refer, is also stated in this specification, and the period of delivery."

B The quantity of chairs stated in the specification was 78,131 joint chairs, and 312,531 intermediate chairs, or, when reduced to weight, the whole quantity to be supplied amounted to 4,150 tons of chairs. Before any of the chairs had been supplied to the railway company, or required by them to be delivered, the company requested the respondents to adopt Messrs. Ransome and May's patent mode of casting the chairs, which request the respondents had agreed to comply with. The respondents had already implemented their part of the contract to the extent of furnishing and delivering to the company at such times and in such quantities as they required for the construction of the permanent road of their railway with reference to the state and progress of their works, 2,710 tons of chairs, manufactured in terms of the aforesaid specification and subsequent agreement as to the patent mode of casting.

C The respondents pleaded that they were able and willing further to implement the contract by furnishing and delivering to the company the remaining quantity of chairs contracted for, to wit, 1,440 tons of chairs; but the company refused to implement the contract by receiving delivery of the same. The respondents prayed that the company might be ordered either specifically to perform the contract by accepting delivery, or to make payment to the respondents of £7,000, or such other sum as should be ascertained to be the amount of the loss and damage sustained by the respondents.

E The company pleaded, first, that Mr. Gibb had no authority to bind them; secondly, that they never contracted in manner and form as alleged; thirdly, that at the time when the agreement was entered into, viz., on Jan. 19 and Feb. 6, 1846, Thomas Blaikie, one of the respondents and a partner in the respondent firm, was a director and chairman of the company, and continued to hold those offices until Feb. 25, 1846, when he resigned on the ground that a firm with which he was connected had accepted employment, and was performing work, for the railway. The company pleaded that

F "under the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 [see s. 86], any such contract or agreement, to which the plaintiff Thomas Blaikie was a party while he remained a director of the company, was illegal, and cannot be enforced."

G The principal question arose on the third plea, in a form analogous to a demurrer in England. The Court of Session pronounced the following order:

H "Find, that the circumstance of Mr. Thomas Blaikie, one of the [respondents], having been a director of the Aberdeen Rail. Co. for some months before and on Feb. 6, 1846, and having thereafter continued to act as such, and not having resigned the office of director till on or about Feb. 25, 1846; is not fatal to the validity of the contract."

From that order the company now appealed.

I Sir Richard Bethell, Q.C., and E. Gordon (of the Scottish Bar) for the appellants. Rolt, Q.C., and Macfarlane (of the Scottish Bar) for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 20, 1854. The following opinions were read.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—The ground relied on by the appellants is that Mr. Thomas Blaikie, holding as he did the situation of chairman of the board of directors, was a trustee for the company, or, at all events, that as between himself and the company he was subject to the same objections as those which affect a trustee in his relation to the cestui que trust, whose interests he is to protect, so that he could not make any contract for his own benefit in relation to the affairs of the company. Messrs. Blaikie, on the other hand, contended, first, that no such defence is set up by the pleas in defence, for that the third plea is not founded on any general doctrine as to the duties of trustees, but on the special provisions of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and that those clauses do not support the proposition contended for. Secondly, they say, even supposing any general question to be properly raised by the plea, still that no such general rule exists in Scotland which would prevent a director from entering, on behalf of the company whose affairs he was managing, into a contract with a firm of which he is a member. A B

Disregarding for the present the statute, I will proceed to consider the more general question, which divides itself into two branches—first, is any such general question raised by the pleas, and, secondly, if it is, then what is the law of Scotland on this subject? The language of the third plea is as follows : C

“Under the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, any such contract or agreement to which the plaintiff, Mr. Thomas Blaikie, was a party, while he remained a director of the company, was illegal and cannot be enforced.”

The respondents contend that the plea raises no question as to the invalidity of the contract arising from Mr. Blaikie's situation as director, except so far as that invalidity is created by the statute, and so the general law on this head is not properly in controversy. But is this so? In order to test the accuracy of this argument we must assume the law to be such as the appellants contend for, namely, that, as a general rule, no director can enter into a contract on behalf of the company with a firm in which he is a partner. What the plea insists on is that the contract entered into by Mr. Blaikie when he was director, is incapable of being enforced, because it is avoided by an Act of Parliament. The proposition itself, that is, the invalidity of the contract by reason of the character which Mr. Blaikie sustained, is distinctly brought forward. The objection ex hypothesi is valid, but a wrong reason is alleged in its support. I confess this seems to me to be immaterial. The object of pleading is to compel the litigant parties to state distinctly the facts on which their title to relief rests. If this is done, the court is bound to apply the law. The only error (assuming the law to be such as the appellants contend it to be) is, that the words “under the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845,” with which the third plea commences, ought to be struck out. But surely this cannot invalidate the plea, so as to prevent the court from applying the law to the facts which correctly appear. I must advise your Lordships, therefore, to hold that, if, on general principles of law, the contract was one incapable of being enforced, there is sufficient on the pleadings to enable your Lordships to decide in conformity with those principles. D E F G

This, therefore, brings us to the general question, whether a director of a railway company is or is not precluded from dealing on behalf of the company with himself or with a firm in which he is a partner. The directors are a body to whom is delegated the duty of managing the general affairs of the company. A corporate body can only act by agents, and it is, of course, the duty of those agents so to act as best to promote the interests of the corporation whose affairs they are conducting. Such an agent has duties to discharge of a fiduciary character towards his principal, and it is a rule of universal application that no one having such duties to discharge shall be allowed to enter into engagements in which he has or can have a personal interest conflicting or which possibly may conflict with the interests of those whom he is bound to protect. So strictly is this principle adhered to that no question is allowed to be raised as to the fairness or unfairness of a contract so entered into. It obviously is, or may be, impossible to demonstrate how far in any particular case the terms of such a contract have been the best for the cestui que trust which it was impossible to obtain. It may sometimes happen that the terms on which a trustee has dealt or attempted to deal with the estate or interests of those for whom he is a trustee have been as good as could have been obtained from any other H I

A person; they may even at the time have been better. But still so inflexible is the rule that no inquiry on that subject is permitted.

The English authorities on this subject are numerous and uniform. The principle was acted on by LORD KING in Keach v. Sandford (1), and by LORD HARDWICKE, in Whelpdale v. Cookson (2), and the whole subject was considered by LORD ELDON on a great variety of occasions. It is sufficient to refer to what fell from that very able and learned judge in Ex parte James (3). It is true that the questions have generally arisen on agreements for purchases or leases of land, and not, as here, on a contract of a mercantile character. But this can make no difference in principle. The inability to contract depends not on the subject-matter of the agreement, but on the fiduciary character of the contracting party, and I cannot entertain a doubt of its being applicable to the case of a party who is acting as manager of a mercantile or trading business for the benefit of others no less than to that of an agent or trustee employed in selling land.

Was, then, Mr. Blaikie so acting in the case now before us? If he was, did he, while so acting, contract, on behalf of those for whom he was acting, with himself? Both these questions must obviously be answered in the affirmative. Mr. Blaikie was not only a director, but, if that was necessary, the chairman of the directors. In that character it was his bounden duty to make the best bargains he could for the benefit of the company. While he filled that character, viz., on Feb. 6, 1846, he entered into a contract on behalf of the company with his own firm for the purchase of a large quantity of chairs at a certain stipulated price. His duty to the company imposed on him the obligation of obtaining these iron chairs at the lowest possible price. His personal interest would lead him in an entirely opposite direction—would induce him to fix the price as high as possible. This is the very evil against which the rule in question is directed; and I see nothing whatever to prevent its application here. I observe that LORD FULLERTON seemed to doubt whether the rule would apply where the party whose act or contract is called in question, is only one of a body of directors not a sole trustee or manager. But, with all deference, this appears to me to make no difference. It was Mr. Blaikie's duty to give to his co-directors, and through them to the company, the full benefit of all the knowledge and skill which he could bring to bear on the subject. He was bound to assist them in getting the articles contracted for at the cheapest possible rate. As far as related to the advice he should give them, he put his interest in conflict with his duty, and whether he was the sole director, or only one of many, can make no difference in principle. The same observation applies to the fact, that he was not the sole person trading with the company. He was one of the firm of Blaikie Brothers with whom the contract was made, and so was interested in driving as hard a bargain with the company as he could induce them to make.

It cannot be contended that the rule to which I have referred is one confined to the English law, and that it does not apply to Scotland. It so happens that one of the leading authorities on the subject is a decision of this House on an appeal from Scotland. I refer to York Buildings Co. v. Mackenzie (4), decided by your Lordships in 1795. There the respondent, Mackenzie, while he filled the office of common agent in the sale of the estates of the appellants, who had become insolvent, purchased a portion of them at a judicial auction, and though he had remained in possession for above eleven years after the purchase and had entirely freed himself from all imputation of fraud, yet this House held that, filling as he did an office which made it his duty both to the insolvents and their creditors to obtain the highest price, he could not put himself in the position of purchaser and so make it his interest that the price paid should be as low as possible. This was a very strong case, because there had been acquiescence for above eleven years. The charges of fraud were not supported—the purchase was made at a sale by auction. LORD ELDON and SIR WILLIAM GRANT were counsel for the respondent, and, no doubt, everything was urged which their learning and experience could suggest in favour of the respondent. But this House considered the general principle one of such importance, and of such universal application, that they reversed the decree of the Court of Session, and set aside the sale. The principle, it may be added, A is found in, if not adopted from, the civil law. In the Digest (Lib. xviii, t. 1, c. 84, s. 7) is the following passage :

"Tutor rem pupilli emere non potest; idemque porrigendum est ad similia, id est, ad curatores, procuratores, et qui negotia aliena gerunt."

In truth, the doctrine rests on such obvious principles of good sense, that it is B difficult to suppose that there can be any system of law in which it would not be found.

It was argued that here the contract ultimately acted on was not entered into while Mr. Blaikie was director, for, though a contract had been entered into in February, yet that contract was afterwards abandoned and new terms agreed on in the following month of June. This, however, is not a true representation of the C facts. The contract of February was, it is true, afterwards modified by arrangement between the parties, but this cannot vary the case. If, indeed, the contracting parties had in June unconditionally put an end to the original contract so as to release each other from all obligation, the one to purchase and the other to sell at a stipulated price, the case would have assumed a different aspect. But this was not done. The contract of June was not a contract entered into between parties D on the footing of there being no obligation then binding on them, but an agreement to substitute one contract for another supposed to be binding. Messrs. Blaikie did not say to the directors in June: "We have no binding contract with you, but we are now willing to contract." What they said amounted in fact to this: "We have a contract which was entered into in February, but we are ready if you desire to modify it." To hold that this in any manner cured the invalidity of the original E contract would be to open a wide door for enabling all persons to make the rule in question of no force.

It was further contended that, whatever may be the general principle applicable to questions of this nature, the legislature has, in cases of corporate bodies like this, modified the rule. The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 86, it was argued, has impliedly, if not expressly, recognised the validity of the contract F by enacting that its effect shall be to remove the director from his office, indicating thereby that a binding obligation would have been created which would render the longer tenure of the office of director inexpedient. Your Lordships were referred to Foster v. Oxford, etc., Rail. Co. (5). That was an action for breach of a contract under seal, whereby the defendants covenanted with the plaintiffs (as in the case now before your Lordships) to purchase from them a quantity of iron. The defen- G dants pleaded that at the time of the contract one of the plaintiffs was a director of their company, and to this plea there was a general demurrer. That such a contract would in this country be good at common law is certain. The rule which we have been discussing is a mere equitable rule, and, therefore, all that the Court of Common Pleas had to consider was how far the contract was affected by the statute. The decision was, that the statute left the contract untouched, and H that its operation was only to remove the director from his office. Sections 85 and 86 of the Act of 1845, on which the court proceeded, were in the same words as ss. 88 and 89 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and the counsel at your Lordships' Bar relied on this decision as being strictly applicable to the case now under appeal. But there is a clear distinction between them. In I Scotland there is no technical division of law and equity [By s. 24 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873 (see now s. 36 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925) it was provided that, as from Nov. 2, 1874, law and equity in England were to be administered concurrently]. The whole question, equitable as well as legal, was before the Court of Session. All which the Court of Common Pleas decided was that a contract clearly good at law was not made void by an enactment that its effect should be to deprive one of the contracting parties of an office.

A That decision will not help the respondents unless they can go further, and show that the statute had the effect of making valid a contract which is bad on general principles enforceable here only in equity and not recognised in our courts of common law. I can discover no ground whatever for attributing to the statute any such effect. Its provisions will still be applicable to the case of directors who become interested in contracts as representatives or otherwise, and not by virtue of contracts made by themselves. I have, therefore, satisfied myself that the Court of Session came to a wrong conclusion; and that the third plea was a sufficient answer to the plaintiff's case. I, therefore, move that the judgment of the court below be reversed.

C LORD BROUGHAM.—I also arrive at the conclusion that the law of Scotland differs in no respect from the law of England upon this matter, and it is very important that it should be understood that there is no such difference between the two systems of jurisprudence. The cases which have been referred to, Whelpdale v. Cookson (2) and chiefly Ex parte James (3), in bankruptcy, clearly lay down what the law of England upon the point is. LORD ELDON, either in Ex parte James (3) or in Campbell v. Walker (6) or in Ex parte Lacey (7) goes even further than D LORD HARDWICKE did in Whelpdale v. Cookson (2), and considers (though he expresses it, no doubt, with the respect due to that eminent judge, rather as a grave doubt than as a well-matured opinion) that LORD HARDWICKE did not go far enough in giving effect to this principle when he said that it was possible that the assent of the creditor might validate the sale.

E How far the two systems of law are the same upon this very important question appears, not only from that to which my noble and learned friend has adverted, namely, York Buildings Co. v. Mackenzie (4), which is the ruling case upon this subject, and which was decided upon an appeal from Scotland, and according to the principles of Scottish law in this House, but it also appears, from the fact that in that case a distinct reference was made, at least in the argument at the Bar, to the English law authorities, and to the very case of Whelpdale v. Cookson (2). F Ex parte James (3) could not have been referred to, because it was decided some years afterwards, but Whelpdale v. Cookson (2) is referred to in the argument at the Scottish Bar, as well as the passage in the Digest from the Roman law which my noble and learned friend has read. It is also to be observed that, not only were the English cases cited in Scotland in that instance, but conversely, the Scottish case of York Buildings Co. v. Mackenzie (4) is referred to afterwards in the English cases—repeatedly at the Bar, and once or twice, I think, by LORD ELDON himself in disposing of English cases.

G York Buildings Co. v. Mackenzie (4) was, as has been observed, after eleven years of possession; and it is remarkable, too, that there was no fraud whatever found imputable to Mr. Mackenzie, the purchaser in that case. I think that, in the account of the subsequent proceedings, though not in the court below, it appears H that so entirely bona fide was Mr. Mackenzie's possession found to be that the rule of the civil law, happily the rule in Scotland, though most unfortunately never introduced into our jurisprudence, namely, that "fruges bona fide perceptae et consumptae" are to be held to be the property of the party who is ultimately held not to have the title, was applied in the case of Mackenzie. So entirely free from I all imputation of fraud was he found to be that he was allowed not merely to remain in undisputed and undisturbed possession of the rents and profits of the estate during those eleven years, that is, up to the period of the appeal, because the rule of bona fide consumption applies not only up to the time of a decision against him in the court below, but up to the final decision of the Court of Appeal. Accordingly, Mr. Mackenzie's bona fides was found to be so unimpeachable and his conduct in the whole transaction was found to be so entirely without fraud that not only did the court below find the other party liable to costs because they had charged him with fraud, which the court at the first decided in his favour, but afterwards he was adjudged to have the whole of the expenses allowed to him to which he had been A put in ornamental improvements upon the estate.

That is certainly one very strong instance of the application of the rule. Perhaps it is stronger than any other within our recollection, because in that case it clearly shows that so entirely was the opinion of the court in favour of the rule, that even while they held that the transaction could not be sustained, but that his purchase B was invalid, they nevertheless decreed him possession of the rents and profits, and also to be allowed for the expenses of the improvement. In that case, my Lords, I must also observe that it was not merely the decision of this House which set the court below right upon a point of Scottish law, as it has once and again done, but the Scottish law appears to have been by no means distinctly maintained by the court below to be as it was ultimately found not to be by your Lordships' decision, for, in the first instance, they decided against the party seeking to set aside the C sale, but the court afterwards by a narrow majority set aside the sale. Then again came both parties to appeal against this second decision, and then by a narrow majority again the court refused to set aside the sale, and found, as I have already stated, that in respect of the charge of fraud, the defendant, Mr. Mackenzie, was entitled to his expenses.

Therefore, it cannot be said to have been at all the understanding of the Court of D Session that the law was in favour of such purchases at the time when you find these two conflicting decisions in the court below, and each by such a very narrow majority. I also agree with my noble and learned friend that the decision in Foster v. Oxford, etc., Rail. Co. (5), in the Common Pleas, upon which great reliance was placed at your Lordships' Bar does not apply to this case, because there the transaction was past all doubt valid at common law, though not in equity. If the E Common Pleas had had an equitable jurisdiction as well as a common law jurisdiction, the anomaly never could have happened of a transaction being found legal and valid in that court, which could not stand examination on the other side of Westminster Hall.

Appeal allowed.

NATIONAL EXCHANGE CO. OF GLASGOW v. DREW AND ANOTHER

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Cranworth, L.C., Lord Brougham and Lord St. Leonards), February 27, March 1, 2, 5, 9, 1855]

[Reported 25 L.T.O.S. 223; 2 Macq. 103]

Company—Director—Fraudulent representation—Inducement to take shares—Liability of company.

The appellants, bankers and brokers, sued the respondents for money lent to them to purchase shares in the company. The respondents pleaded that the directors of the company had in their annual report falsely represented the affairs of the company to be flourishing, whereas it was insolvent, and that they had declared large dividends which, in fact, were paid out of capital. The respondents also said that B., the manager of the company, had falsely represented the shares to be of great value, thus inducing the respondents to purchase them, and at the same time, on behalf of the company, he offered to advance the money necessary to make the purchase, promising that the company would hold the shares for the respondents until they could be sold at a profit, without the respondents being called upon for the price. The respondents said that, relying on these representations, they agreed to this arrangement, and B. bought and paid for the shares, which he retained.

Held: where directors of a company in the discharge of their duties made fraudulent representations about the financial position of the company and so induced persons to buy shares in the company the company was liable for those misrepresentations; in the present case, the transaction must be looked at as a whole, the so-called loan being part of the machinery for giving effect to the fraud; and, therefore, the matters pleaded by the respondents constituted a good defence to the action.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Session whereby the court held certain defences to an action for money lent relevant in law, i.e., good on demurrer.

The appellants were the National Exchange Co. of Glasgow, a joint-stock company established in 1845 for the purpose of making advances on railway stocks and other securities, and for discounting bills and carrying on every kind of banking business. They afterwards added sharebroking to their other business. The respondents were holders of 1,130 shares in the company. In October, 1847, the respondents, wishing jointly to purchase 240 additional shares, instructed the manager of the company to purchase them, and the company, through their manager, acted as the brokers for the purchase. The company also advanced the money to the respondents wherewith to make the said purchase. Afterwards, the respondents having repudiated the contract, were sued by the company for the amount advanced to purchase the shares, viz., £600, with interest at 8 per cent, and commission for purchasing the shares. In their defence the respondents stated that at the first annual meeting of the company, held on Sept. 17, 1846, the shareholders were presented with a report stating that the company's affairs were in a prosperous state, and a dividend of £8 6s. 8d. per cent. was declared, and accordingly paid. At the second annual meeting in September, 1847, another favourable report was submitted, and a dividend of 8 per cent. declared, besides leaving reserved profits exceeding £5,500. This report, it was alleged, was entirely delusive, for no sufficient allowance had been made for bad debts, and the company, so far from being in a situation to pay a dividend, was insolvent. Large losses had arisen from gross neglect and mismanagement on the part of the directors and their manager Mr. Barlow, who had, on his own authority, made large loans on inadequate security. About October, 1847, before the shareholders were aware of the true condition of the company's affairs, the respondents were urgently solicited by Mr. Barlow, the manager, to purchase additional shares of the company's stock. At that period the shares began to fall in the market, and the directors were anxious to counteract rumours unfavourable to the stability of the concern. The manager assured the respondents that the company would advance the necessary funds for purchasing the shares and that the stock would be held until it could be sold at a profit without the respondents being called upon for any contribution in money. The respondents, relying on the representations given by the directors in their reports, and the assurances of the manager Mr. Barlow, bought 240 shares. The company acted as brokers in purchasing the shares and paid the price, and the transfers were taken in favour of the respondents jointly, and remained in the company's hands. The respondents said that they were prevailed on to enter into this transaction by gross fraud and misrepresentation; the reports of the directors and the statements of the manager were a tissue of falsehoods; and at the time when the company undertook to act as brokers for the respondents and to advance the price of the stock, they concealed the fact that the affairs of the company were desperate, and that the stock which they professed to purchase was of no value, and might entail a serious loss to those who acquired it. The appellants contended that the above

A plea was not a relevant defence, but the Court of Session held that it was and gave judgment for the respondents. The appellants appealed.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly and Willes for the appellants.

Sir Richard Bethell, Q.C., and Anderson, Q.C., for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

B Mar. 9, 1855. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—This was an action brought by certain members of the National Exchange Co. of Glasgow to recover from the respondents the sum of £600 with interest and certain small charges, being, as they allege, money advanced by them in order to enable the respondents to purchase 240 shares in the company of third parties, strangers. There is no doubt that the purchase of these shares by the company was made upon the account of the respondents, and made out of the funds of the company, and the simple case made by the appellants, is that this was a loan of money, or in the nature of a loan of money, by them, the company, to the defendants, that that money has never been repaid, and, therefore, the company seek the repayment of that money with interest and certain expenses. Inasmuch as there is no doubt that the advance of money was made, the case so stated undoubtedly presents a prima facie case on the part of the appellants. The respondents set up certain defences in the court below to this claim, and the question is whether those defences are relevant.

The case made by way of defence is that this advance of money was made by the company under circumstances which disentitled the appellants to take it as having created any debt due to them from the respondents, for they said that, shortly before the advance, the company by their directors had fraudulently represented to the respondents that the affairs of the company were in a flourishing state, whereas the company was insolvent or nearly so. The defendants say that that fraudulent misrepresentation induced them to enter into this transaction, into which they would not otherwise have entered. Secondly, they say that the company by their manner urged them to make the purchase, and offered, if they would do so, to advance the money and to take the shares as security for repayment, and said that they would not enforce payment till the shares could be sold at a profit.

The question is whether any relevant defence is stated by means of this statement on the record? The Court of Session held that there was. Undoubtedly, if the contract sued on was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentations on the part of the appellants, no action could be sustained either in Scotland or in this or any other country, governed by any known system of law. I need not travel to any other countries, but certainly in this country and in Scotland a contract obtained by fraud may be treated as being no contract at all. The appellants say, however, that no such case is made, first, because the fraud alleged was not a fraud leading to the contract sued on, that is, the loan. What is sued on is the contract of loan, whereas the plaintiffs say that the fraud, if there were a fraud, was not connected with the contract leading to the loan, but was an inducement to the persons who had borrowed to apply the money in purchasing something at an exorbitant price, supposing the price to be exorbitant, which they would not have done had it not been for the fraudulent misrepresentation. The appellants say that that does not affect the loan; that that was an independent transaction, which was unconnected with the fraud. Secondly, they say that no fraud is alleged against the appellants, but only fraud by the directors, which was a fraud upon the appellants and not a fraud by the appellants. Thirdly, they say, supposing those difficulties were all removed, still that the alleged fraud is not stated with sufficient precision, and is merely a general allegation of falsehood, which it is impossible to meet.

To deal with the first proposition, namely, that there is a relevant case of defence stated independently of any allegation of fraud, I wish to consider the case as it would have stood if the appellants, instead of being a joint-stock company, had been a mere association of two or three individuals, or a single individual or banker.

Would his have been a relevant defence stated, if he had been sued? I must confess this case is one in which my opinion has fluctuated from time to time in the course of the argument, but I have, after much deliberation, come to the conclusion that, quite independently of this statement of fraud, a relevant defence is here stated, which entitles the respondents to resist the demand, even supposing that there had been no question of directors, no question of manager, but this had been a single suit by a single person carrying on business. I come to the conclusion for this reason—I think that the real result of this statement is not that there was a loan at all. The whole transaction must be stated together. What really took place was that the appellants (I will suppose that they were merely two individuals carrying on business in partnership as individuals and as brokers) say to the respondents: "There are certain matters in the market which may be purchased and which are worth 50s. a share." I will assume it was very much for their interest that the shares should be purchased, but whether they made any misrepresentation or not, what they really say to the respondents upon this statement is this: "If you wish to purchase these shares we have such confidence in their value that, if you like, we will, as your agents, advance the money, make the purchases, take the shares ourselves and hold them, and not call upon you for payment until they can be sold at a profit."

Suppose there were no other defence than that, having turned the thing over and over again in my mind, I think that it is a relevant defence, because, in truth, it negatives the assumption which has been proceeded on all along, that this was a loan. A loan means, in ordinary parlance, an advance of money upon a contract to repay it at the will of the lender. There was no such contract here, because the real meaning of this case is (assuming the statement to be accurate), not that there should be a right on the part of the persons who made the purchase, the company, to call for the repayment of the money when it should be their pleasure so to do, but that they should hold the shares which by their representation they were confident would rise and sell at a profit, and then sell them, putting so much money into the pocket of the persons for whom they were thus acting as agents. That may seem a short cut to a conclusion in this case, but I confess that I can see no answer to it. It appears to me that, independently of the questions which have been raised about fraud and as to how far the company are bound by any representations by the directors, and how far there are proper averments of fraud, the statements contained in the defence constitute a good, valid and relevant defence to the action.

If I am right in saying that the whole was one transaction, that there never was a loan in the ordinary sense of the word, that there was merely a purchase by the appellants as agents for the respondents upon a special contract for being repaid in a particular manner, which does not constitute a loan so as to warrant this action, it would seem to be unnecessary to consider the other matters which have been argued. But I should be extremely reluctant to let the case fall through, as it were, upon that short and summary statement, without explaining to some extent what my views would have been supposing that were not a relevant defence. In this part of the case also I have had from time to time the greatest fluctuation of opinion.

The defences which have been insisted upon are, first, that the contract sued on was not a contract arising out of the alleged fraud and misrepresentation. I quite agree that, in order to vitiate a contract and to make it a nullity by reason of fraud, it must be a fraud according to the language which has been so often quoted, dans locum contractui, that is to say that as to the contract in question, if the plaintiffs were right in saying that the loan was one independent transaction, and the purchase another independent transaction, the circumstance that the defendants had been induced by the fraud of the lenders to make the alleged fraudulent purchase, would not vitiate the transaction of the loan. I quite accede to that argument. I think that if I fraudulently represent to another that something in the market is worth £100, when I know it is not worth 100 pence, and he says: "Upon the faith of your representation I will make the purchase, but I have not

- A the money"; and if I say: "Very well, I will lend you the money," I do not think that, when the time came at which I was entitled, according to the contract respecting the loan, to sue for the money lent, the party who had borrowed could say, as a defence to my action: "I should not have borrowed this money of you, if you had not told me the mode in which I was going to apply the money was a lucrative instead of being a disastrous purchase." I think that would not have been a
- B dolus dans locum contractui. The proper remedy in such a case would have been that the party who lent the money would recover the loan, and the person who had borrowed would have a right of action to recover by way of damages against the lender whatever damage he had incurred by having been fraudulently induced to invest the money in an improper mode. I think that course would certainly do complete justice. I do not think any other course would do complete
- C justice in such a case, because, supposing that, instead of a loan of the exact sum, the purchaser had said: "This will cost £600, and I want some money for some other purposes. If you will lend me £1,000 I will make that purchase"; that would have been equally a fraudulent misrepresentation, and a fraudulent misrepresentation that, in one sense, led to the loan. But nobody could say that the lender could not recover any portion of the £1,000 in such a case. There are no means
- D that I can see of apportioning the loan so made. The answer would have been in that case as in this: "If they had been separate transactions, you, the lender, would recover your money, and the person who was fraudulently led by you to invest that money in a mode in which he would not have invested it but for your fraud, must recover in an action of fraud, or an action of that nature, against the person who so deceived him."
- E That I take to be the law both of Scotland and of England, and I should think of most civilised countries. It was argued by counsel for the respondents that justice might be done by forcing the contract upon the person who had lent the money. I do not think that would be the correct mode. I know no principle nor authority that would enable him to do that. It would be setting off against a liquidated demand something that may be recovered of the nature of unliquidated
- F damages. I think that, not only by the law of England and of Scotland but by the law of all other civilised countries, that cannot be done. The inconvenience of it would be excessive. If a person has an actual liquidated money demand which he seeks to enforce and the amount is undisputed, it might be monstrously unjust to him to involve him in a question whether the person who is bound to pay that liquidated sum may or may not have a right of action against him regarding some
- G entirely collateral matter—an action for a fraudulent misrepresentation, or an assault, or a trespass, or any other of those various wrongs which may be inflicted upon a man and for which he may be entitled to compensation. It is clear, in my opinion, that that cannot be the case, either by the law of England or the law of Scotland. Again, to attempt to force the lender of the money to take to the purchase, as it is said, might cause the greatest injustice. There might be cases in which that
- H might do justice, but there might be cases in which it would be very unjust. Suppose, for instance, the purchase had been of a much larger quantity than that represented by the loan, is the lender of the money to take to the whole? It appears to me to be conclusive that neither upon principle nor upon authority could there be anything to warrant such a course as that. Therefore, I am of
- I opinion that if the loan and the purchase had been independent transactions, I should have agreed with the appellants that the dolus was not a dolus dans locum contractui. But, as I have already stated, I think that in this case there was no loan independently of the purchase. I think that the transaction cannot be properly described as a loan. The company wished to induce the defendants to purchase the shares, and for that purpose they made a fraudulent misrepresentation under which they offered to make the purchase for them in the terms I have mentioned. I think that this makes the advance of money not an independent loan, but a part of the machinery for giving effect to the fraud.

Then it was said that, taking that to be so, still there was no fraud on the part of the company; the fraud was a fraud by the directors, and, in fact, the company were not deceivers, but were deceived. The directors of this company appear to have had the duty of superintending, directing, managing, and transacting the whole business and concerns of the company. Part of that duty was to make a correct and honest report as to the state of the concern. They are stated to have done it. I will assume that in order to raise the value of the company and of the shares held by the company they fraudulently misrepresented the real state of the concern, the real amount of its assets, and the real amount of the demands upon it. The question is: What is the consequence of the company receiving such a report (if you can separate the company from the directors) and publishing it to the world? I confess that, in my opinion, that must be taken, as between the company and third persons to be a representation of the company. The company as an abstract being can represent or do nothing. It can only act by its managers in its ordinary transactions, or by its directors or agents where there are duties to be performed by the directors. When, therefore, the directors, in the discharge of their duties, fraudulently and for the purpose of misleading others as to the state of the company, represent the company to be in a different state from that in which they know it to be, and the persons to whom that is addressed act upon it in the belief that it is true, I cannot think that that can be treated as being other than a misrepresentation by the company. Otherwise companies of this kind would be in the extraordinary predicament that they must employ agents to carry on their concerns, and that those agents might make representations, be they never so false, and never so fraudulent, and yet the company must benefit by those representations without being liable for fraud. It was plausibly urged that these reports were not made by the company, but to the company. In form, that is so. No doubt, they are reports made to the company, but I assume that they were made to the company under such circumstances that what they so report is known, and intended to be known, not only to the shareholders, but to all persons who may be minded to be shareholders, just as if they were published to the world. I repeat that I think the exigencies of society demand that reports so made and so circulated should be deemed to be the reports of the company.

It was pressed upon us that the contrary has been held by your Lordships in Burnes v. Pennell (1). To every word of that decision I most entirely agree as it would be my duty to do even if I did not go along with the reasoning. But I do go along with the reasoning. There the representation was made by a person who knew the subject-matter he was representing, but had no duty to perform towards the company, he being in the same position towards the company as if he had been a mere stranger. It was the duty of the directors to make a report, showing correctly the state of the company. It was no duty of the solicitor of the company to make any representation at all. He was speaking quite ultra vires when he made the representation which he did make, and to have bound the company by what he said would have been an act of very gross injustice. I think, therefore, that it must be taken that the representation of the state of the company made by the directors in their report must be taken as being a representation made by the company. Therefore, if there were fraudulent misrepresentations made by the directors in their annual report to the company, and they were circulated so as to mislead the respondents, I think that must be taken as being the fraud of the company.

It was said that the persons imposed upon were the company; that the company was a party imposed upon and not imposing, and that the respondents were themselves part of those persons who were imposed upon, because they were the owners of 1,100 odd shares in the company previously to this purchase. I do not think that the circumstance that the person was already a shareholder would have made any difference in a transaction of this sort. I do not wish to bind myself on that subject conclusively with respect to the law of this country, but certainly by the law of Scotland a shareholder, even in an ordinary partnership, is considered as

A having a distinct identity from the partnership. We see continually, in pleadings in actions, that both the partnership individuals sue or are sued as being independent parties. It is quite clear to my mind that the individual shareholders or partners have a right in a transaction of this sort to treat themselves as something different from the company, even if that could not have been the case according to the law of England. Therefore, I come to the conclusion, that if the directors, B in the discharge of their duty of making annual reports, giving a correct representation as to the state of the company, fraudulently and with a view to raising the value of the shares of the company, misrepresent what the state of the company is so that third persons, or shareholders (whom for this purpose we may treat as third persons), are deceived, and act upon that misrepresentation, the persons so deceived and so acting have a right to treat themselves as having been fraudulently deceived C by the company. I, therefore, move your Lordships to affirm the judgment of the court below.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I, as well as my noble and learned friend, have had very grave doubts, to say the least of it, during the course of the argument and since it closed, in considering the result of it whether this decree of the Court of Session D could be affirmed.

This company, being minded to have the value of its shares in the market kept up by the purchase of shares by the respondents, suggested to them that they ought to go into the market and buy those shares; and in order to remove any difficulty from their way in making that purchase, they offered to advance them a sufficient fund, £600 odd, by way of loan, wherewithal they might be able to make the E purchase which the company, for their own interest, were desirous that they should make. So doing they make a misrepresentation of the value of the shares; they are really worth £50 in the market, and they represent that they are worth £100; but they lend the £100, or whatever may be the sum required to make the purchase, in order to facilitate the transaction, and it turns out that they deceived the respondents. They deceived them for they bought for £100 shares which proved not to F be worth more than £50.

It is quite clear that the respondents for that false representation had an action against those who made the misrepresentation. But are they not to repay the loan of money which was lent to them? Did they not voluntarily take that loan for the purpose of enabling them to purchase the shares? No doubt they bought the shares owing to the misrepresentation, and suffered a loss. But they borrowed G the money from the company, and are they not bound to repay that loan, though they may have an action against the company for the misrepresentation? If the company bring their action against them for the repayment of the loan, they cannot set off against the company any claim that they may have against them in tort for the misrepresentation. But are they not bound to repay the loan? No doubt, if the whole is taken to be one transaction, it may be liable to a different construction. H Are they to retain the shares, and not to pay back the money which the company advanced to them in order to enable them to purchase the shares? My noble and learned friend's view of the case is calculated to get over that difficulty, because, though he does not, upon the whole, deny that the judgment below may stand upon the ground upon which alone, be it observed, it is put, and upon which alone, I rather think, upon examining the pleadings, it could be put, yet, my noble I and learned friend, though not denying the possibility of affirming the judgment below upon that ground, holds that this is the real nature of the transaction, and thereby, I admit, if this view is well founded, it, to a certain extent, no doubt, gets over the difficulty that I have stated with respect to retaining the shares, such as they are, whatever their real value may be.

It is said: "The manager assured the defenders that the company would advance the necessary funds for purchasing the shares, and that the stock would be held until it could be sold at a profit." If it had stopped there, I should have had no doubt whatever that my noble and learned friend would have had a right to put it in the way he did—that there was an undertaking upon the part of the company in lending the money not to call upon them for the repayment until that event took place—“until the shares could be sold at a profit.” But I am afraid that what follows renders that somewhat doubtful, for, after the statement “that the stock would be held until it could be sold at a profit,” it goes on to say, “without the defenders being called upon for any contribution in money, the company being secure by the large amount of stock held upon joint account.” That seems to me to be an undertaking, not to the effect that they will not call upon the party borrowing for repayment of the money until a rise in value took place, but only an undertaking that he should be saved harmless from any call upon him in respect of those shares, “the company being secure by the large amount of stock held upon joint account.”

Upon the whole, my Lords, I retain very considerable doubts upon this subject. Had it not been for the view taken by my noble and learned friend, those doubts would have been so strong as to have prevented me from concurring in the judgment of affirmance. But, upon the view taken by my noble and learned friend, I go so far with him as not to object to that judgment of affirmance.

LORD ST. LEONARDS.—The facts of the case lie in a very small compass indeed. Independently of the questions which arise upon the representation made by the company in January in their report (upon which my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack has so much enlarged) there were specific representations made by the company, or by their manager, to the respondents. For the moment, I will put it out of sight, that the respondents themselves were shareholders in the company.

With respect to these reports, in which very often directors have indulged their fancy considerably, and not always consulted the exact facts, it is one thing to say how far the representations made are to affect third persons, and how far they are to affect the company. This is not a case in which the question is whether a dealing between two third parties could be affected by the representations in a report, which I am clearly of opinion it could not; that is to say, if John, believing the representations of the company, had gone into the market and bought of Thomas shares, which Thomas had to sell, John could never be relieved from his contract because he had believed the representations of the company that they were flourishing and paying properly a dividend out of profits, and not, as it might turn out, as often has been the case, out of capital. This is not that case; but it is a case in which, if the company made a representation, or if their manager made a representation which binds them, he acting as their agent, the company were to have the benefit of that representation, and, therefore, it is a case in which, if the company put forth representations which were false in order to keep up the value of their shares, and if, when dealing with the respondents, they were to reap a benefit by those representations, that benefit would throw upon them the obligation which attaches to persons who make false representations to those with whom they dealt.

What was the situation of the company? The company were bankers, money-lenders, and brokers. They acted in all these capacities, and they particularly had a power to lend money upon shares. The allegation, therefore, is this: “You, the company, in these various characters have induced us, the respondents, to buy shares in a falling market, representing that they were of value, when you knew they were valueless, and in order to induce us to do so, you said you would advance us money in your capacity as moneylenders to buy them. Further, in order to carry on this transaction, you told us that in your capacity as brokers you would buy the shares for us in the market, acting as our brokers. Consequently, we fell into this trap (for such it must be considered to be). We said we would take the shares, if you would advance the money, with the assurance that it would be all profit and no loss, and that the company would be perfectly secure.” What was the way in which it was attempted to carry the transaction into effect? The com-

A pany were acting as brokers for these persons. They show by their proceedings that they were acting as agents in the purchase, upon an advance of money. It shows simply only one transaction. Therefore, I cannot say that I participate in the doubts expressed by my noble and learned friends. I have looked throughout at this case as one in which there was one transaction. The measure of the value of the property is the measure of the money advanced. They are co-equal. The shares never were of that value, one knows, but they were the representatives of that value. The whole sum is a sum advanced which is called a loan, and that loan constituted the purchase-money. If there had been no loan, there would have been no purchase. The purchase and the loan were precisely one transaction, although consisting of two parts. I never have been embarrassed by considering the loan as a separate transaction. The company would never have lent the respondents five shillings upon any separate transaction without security; they would not have advanced them five shillings for any collateral purpose. But, in order to keep the shares up in the market, and to throw upon the respondents the liability which these shares would impose upon them, they advanced the money and got half per cent. commission upon the advances. That was a transaction, the temptation to which they could not resist. It was a transaction founded upon misrepresentation and fraud. What do they themselves say in their own declaration? By way of excuse in suing the respondents for the whole of the money advanced, which represented the whole of the purchase-money, they proceed to say that the shares are not saleable in the market, that is to say, in other words, the shares are valueless. That is their excuse for suing the respondents, whom they induced to make this purchase, for the whole of the purchase-money.

E I have certainly come to the conclusion that if representations are made by a company fraudulently for the purpose of enhancing the value of their stock, and they induce a third person to purchase stock, those representations so made by them for that purpose bind the company. I consider representations by the directors of a company as representations by the company, although they may be representations made to the company. It is their own representation. What is the first act which takes place at any such meeting as that at which this report was read? The first thing which takes place at every such meeting in Scotland and in England is, that, if there is not a rejection, there is an adoption of the report. Then, I say, the report is the act of the company, and not simply of the directors. It does not stand as the simple statement of the directors. It becomes the act of the company by the adoption of the report, and sending it forth to the world as a true representation of their affairs. If that representation is made use of in dealing with third persons for the benefit of the company, it subjects the company to liability for the loss which may accrue to a party who deals trusting to those misrepresentations.

H The cases have been very much discussed, and a good deal of argument has turned upon representations by agents. I think we need not embarrass ourselves much with that question here, because I consider that here it is made out that the representations were by the company. There is no doubt that Mr. Barlow was the manager of the company, that Mr. Barlow was acting in conformity with the views of the directors, and that Mr. Barlow was the man who had the power to advance the money. That is the main point upon which everything turns. He was the person who advanced the money, he was the person who conducted the brokerage. Then I find that the agent, who has all these powers, is the manager of the bank. If I find him acting as the broker and lender of the money, and that his management leads to this transaction, I can have no doubt that the act of an agent so acting with all this authority, taking it all as one transaction, is binding upon the company.

We have had very much to consider Cornfoot v. Fowke (2), upon which I will say a word with regard to misrepresentations of agents. That was a very peculiar case. As it was explained by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, there is no fault to be found with the decision in that case, because there it was held that the defendant had not been induced, by fraud, covin and misrepresentation on the part of the plaintiff to enter into the contract. The case was of this nature. A house was to let, I think it was next door to a brothel—it was a house which no respectable family could inhabit. The gentleman who was about to take it had a family growing up of both sons and daughters, and it would have been impossible for him to live in it under the circumstances. When he went to look at the house he was struck by the cheapness of the price, and he asked the agent whether there was anything objectionable about the house. That was admitted to include any nuisance next door. The agent, who was utterly ignorant of the nature of the occupation of the adjoining house, said that there was not. When the gentleman retired from the contract, the owner brought an action against him for non-performance of the contract. Upon the trial the jury, under the direction of LORD ABINGER, C.B., found for the defendant. That was set aside by the Court of Exchequer upon the ground that the allegation was of fraud and covin. There was no evidence of any fraud on the part of the owner of the house, who had made no false representation. There was no fraud upon the part of the agent, because he was not aware of the circumstances. Consequently, the gentleman was fixed with the contract.

Supposing there had been in that case no allegation of fraud, but it had been put simply upon the ground of misrepresentation, it was not denied in the course of the judgment, as I understand it, that if a principal, with knowledge of a fact which was material to the value of the property, with a view to concealing that fact employed an agent to sell it whom he knew to be ignorant of the fact, he could not avail himself of that concealment but would be responsible for any loss suffered by the purchaser. That, I think, seems to have been admitted in that judgment. But I should take the liberty of going further. I should say, that if, in that case, fraud had not been alleged, but it had been put upon misrepresentation, and the facts were that a man, knowing that there was so serious a nuisance affecting the house as to diminish its value in such a way that no man of respectability could live in it, and he took care himself not to make the contract, but left it to an agent, who he had no reason to suppose was aware of the fact, and if, in the course of the treaty for the contract, the agent being asked if such a fact existed, stated positively that it did not, and the contract was executed in silence upon the point, because the purchaser had been lulled to sleep and he believed the representation made to him by the agent, I say, in such a case as that, I should be very much shocked at the law of England if I could bring myself to believe that it would not reach the case of a principal so availing himself of a misrepresentation by his own agent, who might be ignorant of the fact, although the principal himself knew it and employed the agent in order to avoid making a direct representation to the contrary. I should hope that the law of England would reach a case of that sort. I should feel no hesitation, if I had to decide that case, in saying that, although the misrepresentation was not fraudulent, the agent not knowing that it was false, yet, as in fact it was false, and false to the knowledge of the principal, it ought to bind the principal. If, upon a matter so material to the value of the property, he left it to his agent to deal with the property without informing him of so important a fact, which was within his own knowledge, and the agent made a false representation with regard to that fact, it would bind the principal and thus impeach the validity of the contract.

The one great difficulty that has been raised in this case is with respect to the liability of the directors. Upon that I have already stated my view. But it has been pressed very much upon the doctrine of set-off, and upon the impossibility of setting aside this transaction in this particular case. I think the law of set-off has not the slightest bearing upon the subject. I never could understand the force of the argument. I know the way in which it was put, but I never have been able to satisfy my mind that the law of set-off has the slightest bearing upon the case. The appellants think fit to bring an action for the whole of the purchase-money, which is, in other words, the loan which they advanced. The defence is fraud and misrepresentation. Why should not that go to the whole of the loan? It is said: "You ought to have your counter-action; you should bring an action for damages,

A then those damages could be set off against a liquidated sum due under this contract." It is also said: "Why are you to be relieved from the whole of this sum, and yet to keep those shares? How monstrous for you to keep those valuable shares, which are not saleable in the market, and to keep the money too." What is the real state of the case? If the view I have submitted to your Lordships be the true one (and I have the authority of my noble and learned friend for saying that it is), that this is one transaction, all bound up, all depending upon the advance of money, and that money invested in this purchase leading to this result, where are the shares? In the custody of the company. Have they ever been in the custody of the respondents? Never. Can they ever get them into their hands? Never. Could they after this defence maintain an action for them? What is the value of their standing in their names with the power in the company over their own shareholders and over their dividends? Will any man represent that any action or proceeding could be maintained by the respondents for these shares after the defence which has been put into this action, if it be successful? Clearly and decidedly not.

But supposing it were necessary that there should be a transfer of the shares, why may not one of two things take place? In the first place, I asked during the argument, and I heard no answer to my question, what there was to prevent the Court of Session, if the issue be favourable to the respondents, in relieving them from their obligation to the lenders to direct a transfer of the shares, if the company desired, to the company? What is there to prevent the Court of Session from exercising that power? The Court of Session is a court of law and equity. A court of equity would not hesitate a moment, in giving relief in a case of this sort, in directing the respondents, if the appellants desired it, to transfer at the expense of the appellants the shares in question. No action is necessary to recover them; but, if it were necessary, it is the appellants' own act which would have rendered it necessary. They choose, in order to keep up the market, to buy shares in the names of these persons. They advance all the money, and now they seek to recover the whole of it. The defence is fraud on the part of the lenders, and the defence must go to the whole, for the purchase and the loan are one and the same transaction. There is nothing to set off. The shares are valueless. It is not a question of what the value of the shares is; that is utterly unimportant. Supposing I bought an estate, and I desired to be relieved from the contract on the ground of fraud, and I filed a bill upon that ground and proved the case, the court would relieve me from the contract. I should have that relief without any reference to the question of what the value of the estate was--whether the estate was worth but one-third of the money which I had given for it, or worth the whole amount, would be of no consequence. Supposing there was any defence to be set up, it would not be upon the question of what the value of the property was, but the question would be whether the party was entitled to make that defence as to the whole or not. Upon the whole I concur with my noble and learned friends in advising your Lordships to affirm the decision of the court below.

BUCKLAND v. JOHNSON

[COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (Jervis, C.J., Maule, Cresswell and Crowder, JJ.), June 7, 1854]

Estoppel—Estoppel by record—Conversion—Joint conversion—Recovery against one convertor in trover—Bar to action against other convertor for money had and received.

If two persons jointly convert goods and one of them receives the proceeds, the owner of the goods cannot, after a recovery against one convertor in trover, have an action against the other for the same conversion or an action for money had and received to recover the value of the goods for which judgment has been given in the former action.

The plaintiff recovered judgment in an action for conversion against the defendant's son, who was assisting his father, an auctioneer, and had sold the plaintiff's goods. The plaintiff received nothing under the judgment, and sought to sue the defendant for money had and received. The defendant was allowed to amend at the trial by adding that the money was "received for the sale of the goods."

Held: the judgment for conversion was a bar to the action for money had and received, even in respect of the excess of the price for which the goods were sold over the amount recovered on the judgment.

B Action for goods sold and delivered, and for money had and received, with a count in trover.

Thomas Barbour Johnson, the son of the defendant William Johnson, assisted his father in his business of an auctioneer, and in that capacity sold goods of the plaintiff by auction in circumstances which amounted to a conversion. The father was in and out of the room during the progress of the sale, and the proceeds were paid to him alone. An action of trover was brought by the plaintiff against T. B. Johnson, and judgment was recovered, but no satisfaction was obtained, the son having applied for relief under the Insolvent Debtors Act.

D In the present action the plaintiff declared for money had and received, goods sold and delivered, and money found due upon an account stated, and also for that the defendant converted to his own use, and wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the use and possession of, the plaintiff's goods. The defendant pleaded, by the fourth plea in the defence, as amended by the permission of the learned judge at the trial, as to so much of the declaration as related to money payable for money received by the defendant to the plaintiff's use, and to the household furniture, glass, linen, china, books, and plate, that the said money was money received for, and as, and being the proceeds of the sale of the goods mentioned, and that the grievances in the last count mentioned, so far as they related to the household furniture, glass, linen, china, books, and plate, were committed by the defendant and T. B. Johnson jointly, and not by the defendant alone, and so T.B. Johnson was with the defendant jointly liable to the plaintiff for the said causes of action, and the judgment recovered by the plaintiff in the action against T. B. Johnson included all the causes of action put forward by the plaintiff. The cause was tried before WILLIAMS, J., who left the case to the jury, and they found that the defendant's plea was proved. Accordingly his Lordship directed a verdict to be entered for the defendant, reserving leave to the plaintiff to enter a verdict for £148 15s., if the court should now be of opinion that the plea as amended afforded no defence.

G Serjeant Byles, for the plaintiff, obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict. Lush, for the defendant, showed cause against the rule.

H JERVIS, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The question which was substantially in issue between the parties was, not whether the proceeds of the sale of the plaintiff's goods had been received by the defendant and his son jointly, but whether there had been a substantial recovery by the plaintiff in the former action so as to bar his right to recover in this.

I The authorities show—and indeed it is not denied—that, if Thomas Barber Johnson, the son, had received the money as well as converted the goods, and Buckland had sued him in trover, and obtained a judgment against him, even though it had produced no fruits, that judgment would have been a bar to another action against him for money had and received. Upon the same principle, if two jointly convert goods and one of them receives the proceeds, you cannot, after a recovery against one in trover, have an action against the other for the same conversion, or an action for money had and received to recover the value of the goods for which a judgment has already passed in the former action. It is said that, as the plaintiff recovered only £100 in the action against Thomas Barber Johnson, and the present defendant received £150 as the value of the goods, the plea should at all events only be considered as a bar to the extent of £100, and for this he relies on Hitchin v. Campbell (1). That case, however, does not sustain the position for which it was cited. It was an action for money had and received by the defendant for the use A of the plaintiff, to which the defendant pleaded in bar that the plaintiff had brought an action of trover against him and one A.B. to recover damages against him for divers goods and chattels of the plaintiff supposed to be converted by them to their own use, to which they pleaded the general issue. A verdict was found for them (the defendants), and judgment was entered thereupon, which the defendant B pleaded in bar to the action, and averred that the goods and chattels for which the action in trover was brought were the same goods for the produce whereof (by sale) the action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for money had and received for the plaintiff's use. On demurrer, the court held that a judgment for the defendant in trover was no bar to an action for money had and received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff. As the verdict for the defen- C dants in the action of trover might have gone upon the ground that the sale of the goods took place with the plaintiff's authority—which, though it would negative the alleged conversion, would be no answer whatever to an action for money had and received—that case is obviously no authority on the present occasion.

The whole fallacy of the plaintiff's argument in the present case arises from his losing sight of the fact that, by the judgment in the action of trover, the property in the goods was changed, by relation, from the time of the conversion, and that, D consequently, the goods from that moment became the goods of Thomas Barber Johnson, and when the present defendant received the proceeds of the sale, he received his son's money, the property in the goods being then in him. Some of the authorities do, indeed, seem to lay it down that it is not the recovery only, but the recovery coupled with the payment of the damages, that changes the property. Thus, in Cooper v. Shepherd (2), TINDAL, C.J., delivering the judgment E of the court, says (3 C.B. at p. 272):

"The plaintiff in trover, where no special damage is alleged, is not entitled to damages beyond the value of the chattel he has lost; and, after he has once received the full value, he is not entitled to further compensation in respect of the same loss: and, according to the doctrine of the cases which were cited F in the argument, by a former recovery in trover, and payment of the damages, the plaintiff's right of property is barred, and the property vests in the defendant in that action: see Adams v. Broughton (3), 2 Stra. 1078, and JENKINS, 4th Cent., Case 88, where it is laid down: 'A., in trespass against B. for taking a horse, recovers damages: by this recovery, and execution done thereon, the property in the horse is vested in B. Solutio pretii emptionis loco habetur.' "

But, in the fuller report of Adams v. Broughton (3) in Andrews, 18, where an action G of trover had been brought by Adams against one Mason wherein he obtained judgment by default and afterwards had final judgment, whereupon a writ of error was brought, and another action of trover was afterwards brought by Adams for the same goods for which the first action was brought, against Broughton, the court, upon a motion to hold the defendant in the second action to bail, distinctly lay it down that H

"the property of the goods is entirely altered by the judgment obtained against Mason, and the damages recovered in the first action are the price thereof, so that he hath now the same property therein as the original plaintiff had;
and this against all the world."

By "damages recovered," the court evidently did not mean "paid," for a writ of I error was then pending in the first action.

This is explained by the principle laid down by PARKE, B., in King v. Hoare (4) (13 M. & W. at pp. 504, 505):

"If there be a breach of contract, or wrong done, or any other cause of action by one against another, and judgment be recovered in a court of record, the judgment is a bar to the original cause of action, because it is thereby reduced to a certainty, and the object of the suit attained, so far as it can be at that stage; and it would be useless and vexatious to subject the defendant

A to another suit for the purpose of obtaining the same result. Hence the legal maxim, 'transit in rem judicatam,'—the cause of action is changed into matter of record, which is of a higher nature, and the inferior remedy is merged in the higher. This appears to be equally true where there is but one cause of action, whether it be against a single person or many. The judgment of a court of record changes the nature of that cause of action, and prevents its being the subject of another suit, and the cause of action, being single, cannot afterwards be divided into two. Thus, it has been held, that if two commit a joint tort, the judgment against one is of itself, without execution, a sufficient bar to an action against the other for the same cause: Brown v. Wootton (5), Yelv. 67, Cro. Jac. 73, Moore, 762. And though, in the report in YELVERTON, expressions are used which at first sight appear to make a distinction between actions for unliquidated damages and debts, yet, upon a comparison of all the reports, it seems clear that the true ground of the decision was not the circumstance of the damages being unliquidated. POPHAM, C.J. (Cro. Jac. 74), states the true ground. He says: 'If one hath judgment to recover in trespass against one, and damages are certain,' (that is, converted into certainty by the judgment), 'although he be not satisfied, yet he shall not have a new action for this trespass. By the same reason, à contrà, if one hath cause of action against two, and obtain judgment against one, he shall not have remedy against the other: and the difference betwixt this case and the case of debt and obligation against two, is, because there every of them is chargeable, and liable to the entire debt; and, therefore, a recovery against one is no bar against the other until satisfaction.' And it is quite clear that the chief justice was referring to the case of a joint and several obligation, both from the argument of the counsel, as reported in CRO. JAC., and the statement of the case in YELVERTON. We do not think that the case of a joint contract can, in this respect, be distinguished from a joint tort. There is but one cause of action in each case. The party injured may sue all the joint tort-feasors or contractors, or he may sue one, subject to the right of pleading in abatement in the one case, and not in the other; but, for the purpose of this decision, they stand on the same footing. Whether the action is brought against one or two, it is for the same cause of action."

The right of action is merged in the judgment. It is the judgment that disposes of the matter, and not the payment.

G MAULE, J.—I also am of opinion that this rule should be discharged, and that the case was a very proper one for amendment at the trial. The amendment asked for and allowed did not alter the substance of the plea, or in any degree vary that which was the real question in controversy between the parties, viz., whether the plaintiff had recovered against one of two joint tortfeasors, so as to make that recovery a bar to a subsequent action against the other. That question was raised H by the plea as it originally stood, and it was also raised by the plea as amended. The plea as amended seems to me to be a good plea; and, being proved, afforded a good defence to the action. It states, in substance, that the money sought to be recovered in this action was the proceeds of certain goods of the plaintiff which the defendant and Thomas Barber Johnson had jointly converted, and that the plaintiff had sued Thomas Barber Johnson for that conversion, and recovered a verdict I against him for £100, the value of the goods so converted. That seems to me to afford a substantial answer to the action.

In an action of trover, the plaintiff may not always recover the full value of the thing converted, and, if it had been shown here that the plaintiff had not recovered the full value of the goods in question in the former action, I will not say what the consequences might have been. But here we must take it that the plaintiff did recover the full value in the former action. Having his election to sue in trover for the value of the goods at the time of the sale, or for the proceeds of the sale as money had and received, the plaintiff elected the former remedy, and he has obtained a verdict and judgment. He has, therefore, got what the law considers equivalent to payment, viz., a judgment for the full value of the goods. It appears upon the plea and upon the evidence, that the sum actually received by the defendant as the proceeds of the sale exceeded the amount for which the plaintiff recovered judgment in the former action. But, when the plaintiff made his election to sue in trover for the value at the time of the sale, he was bound by the estimate of the jury. A

The circumstance of the present defendant's having been a joint converter, or a stranger, makes, I think, no difference. If he were a stranger, the plaintiff, having once recovered in respect of the same goods, cannot recover again the same thing against somebody else. There is an end of the transaction. Having once recovered a judgment, his remedy was altogether gone: his claim was satisfied as against all the world. He was in fact in the position of a person whose goods had never been converted at all. For these reasons, I think the rule should be discharged. B C

CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion upon both points, and for the reasons already given. As to the suggestion thrown out that the plaintiff ought to be allowed to recover the difference between the value of the goods as fixed by the verdict in the former action of trover and the sum received by the present defendant as the proceeds of the sale, I think there is no foundation whatever for it. The plaintiff had his election to treat the conversion as a wrongful act, and recover the value of the goods at the time of the sale, in an action of trover, or to adopt the sale as an act done with his sanction, and sue for the proceeds, as for money had and received to his use. Having elected the former course, he is bound by it, and cannot in a new action claim any part of the proceeds. D E

CROWDER, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The case clearly was a proper one for an amendment. The substance of the issue which the parties went down to try was whether or not the judgment in the former action against Thomas Barber Johnson, which had produced no fruits to the plaintiff, was a bar to the present action. The plea as originally framed alleged that the proceeds of the sale were received by Thomas Barber Johnson and the present defendant jointly, and it turned out upon the evidence that they were received by the defendant alone. The amendment, therefore, was asked for, and was I think properly allowed without the imposition of any terms. Then comes the question whether the plea as amended is a good bar to the action. It appears to me that it is, on the grounds stated by my Lord and MAULE, J. The plaintiff having a cause of action in trover or for money had and received, at his election against two has brought trover against one, and recovered judgment against him. It happens that that judgment is for £100 only, and that the defendant actually received £148 as the proceeds of the goods converted: and, therefore, it is contended that the recovery in the former action is no bar as to £48. The circumstance, however, of the two amounts being different is a mere accident, which cannot alter the principle upon which our judgment proceeds, which is that the plaintiff, having made his election to sue for the tort, and having recovered what the jury considered the value of the goods at the time of the conversion, cannot now bring money had and received in respect of the same cause of action. Rule discharged.

SMITH v. KENDRICK

[COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (Wilde, C.J., Maule, Cresswell and Williams, JJ.), January 21, May 5, 1848, February 14, 1849]

13 Jur. 362; 137 E.R. 205]

Coal Mine—Working of mine—Flooding of adjoining mine—Right to work mine in way most beneficial to owner—No negligence or malice.

The plaintiff and the defendant occupied adjoining collieries, the plaintiff's colliery being at a lower level than the defendant's. Their mines were separated by a thick vertical seam of coal belonging to the plaintiff. Through this seam J. (a former occupier of the defendant's mine), had wrongfully made holes, called "thyrings," into the plaintiff's mine, for the purpose of ventilation. The defendant, in working his mine most advantageously to himself, removed a bar of coal which was in his colliery and had protected his colliery against a body of water on a higher level. The water entered the defendant's colliery, and part of it flowed down through the thyrings into the plaintiff's mine. Between J., who made the thyrings through the plaintiff's barrier, and the defendant, who succeeded J. in possession, there was neither privity of contract or of estate, but the defendant knew that the effect of his letting water into his own mine would be to flood the plaintiff's mine through the thyrings.

Held: (i) there was no special duty on the defendant, arising out of the fact that he had succeeded in occupation of J., who had wrongfully bored the thyrings, to protect against water flowing into the plaintiff's mine; (ii) it was the natural right of each of the owners of two adjoining coal-mines, neither of them being subject to servitude to the other, to work his mine in the manner most beneficial to himself, though the natural consequence might be that some prejudice would accrue to the owner of the adjoining mine, so long as it did not arise from negligent or malicious conduct; and, therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

Action on the Case, in which the New British Iron Co.—who were incorporated by an Act of Parliament (7 & 8 Vict., c. xxx) and sued by their secretary and registered public officer, were the real plaintiffs—to recover damages against the defendant for wrongfully omitting to prevent water from flowing through his mine into the mine of the company; and also for wrongfully causing water to flow from his mine into the mine of the company. I

The action was tried at Chester Summer Assizes, 1846, when a verdict by consent was taken for the plaintiff, subject to a Special Case for the opinion of this court. The pleadings form a part of the Special Case, all the material passages of which are fully set out in the judgment.

Townsend and T. Jones for the plaintiff.

Evans, Q.C., Welsby and J. Brown for the defendant.

Feb. 14, 1849. CRESSWELL, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—This was an action on the case, tried at Chester at the Summer Assizes of 1842, when a verdict, by consent, was found for the plaintiff, subject to a Special Case. The pleadings form part of the Special Case.

The declaration consisted of two counts; the first of which was abandoned by the plaintiff. By the second count the plaintiff, in substance, complained that there were two collieries underground adjoining one another; one called Plas Bennion, and the other Avon Eitha; the Avon Eitha being on a higher level than the Plas Bennion; that Plas Bennion had many chambers from which coal had been extracted, and belonging to a party called the Plas Bennion Colliery; that there had been a wall or seam of coal between those chambers and certain other chambers, forming part of Avon Eitha Colliery, from which coal had been extracted; that the plaintiffs were in possession of the Plas Bennion Colliery, and while the company were so possessed of Plas Bennion, one Evan Jones, and others, were possessed of Avon Eitha; and while they were so possessed, the said Evan Jones and the other persons who were possessed of the Avon Eitha Colliery, by force and arms, broke into and entered the Plas Bennion Colliery, and made divers holes in the wall forming the eastern extremity thereof; and from such wall aforesaid, extracted large quantities of coal; and after the extraction of the said coal, the said Evan Jones, and others, ceased to be possessed of Avon Eitha, and the defendant became possessed of Avon Eitha; and while the defendant continued so possessed, the holes remained, and were not stopped up; and by reason of the grievance so committed by the said Evan Jones, the Plas Bennion Colliery became, and was, and still is, liable to be inundated and flooded on occasions of water being introduced into Avon Eitha, by such water coming to the eastern extremity of the Plas Bennion Colliery, and penetrating through the holes. That before the said holes were made, and before the extraction of the coal from the seam or bed of coal, that seam of coal, into and through which the water was introduced, would have formed a barrier sufficient to prevent the water from entering into the Plas Bennion Colliery; and that by reason of the defendant's possession of the Avon Eitha Colliery the defendant, while so possessed, and still, of right, ought to prevent the water so introduced to Avon Eitha by the defendant from flowing through the said holes and penetrating through the seam or vein of coal in the eastern extremity of Plas Bennion. The declaration then charged that the defendant wrongfully introduced large quantities of water into the Avon Eitha Colliery, and that the defendant wrongfully omitted to prevent the said water so introduced into Avon Eitha from flowing into Plas Bennion.

The defendant pleaded Not Guilty, and several other pleas traversing some material allegations in the declaration. The fourteenth plea denied the right to prevent the water flowing into Plas Bennion as alleged in the declaration. The defendant also pleaded a judgment recovered in a former action.

The case was referred to a member of the Bar, who was to state a Special Case for the opinion of the court; and that Case stated in substance that the plaintiffs for many years last past, and up to the time of the commencement of this action, have been in possession of a colliery called Plas Bennion, in the parish of Ruabon, in the county of Denbigh. In 1840, and while the plaintiffs were in the possession of Plas Bennion as aforesaid, one Evan Jones and other, his partners, became possessed of an adjoining colliery, called the Avon Eitha Colliery, in the same parish. Evan Jones and his partners continued to be possessed of the last-mentioned colliery until December, 1844. At this time they quitted possession and were succeeded by the defendant who has remained in possession ever since. The Avon Eitha Colliery is on a higher level than the Plas Bennion Colliery. At the time when Evan Jones and his partners commenced their occupation of the Avon Eitha Colliery both that colliery and the Plas Bennion Colliery had been worked to a great extent, and they each contained several chambers made by the removal of large quantities of coal. At the time last mentioned the colliery of Plas Bennion was bounded on the east by a vertical seam or vein of coal the property of the plaintiffs, and part of their colliery and this seam or vein of coal formed a barrier between the chambers in Plas Bennion and the chambers in Avon Eitha. A

In the beginning of the year 1844, Evan Jones and partners made three large holes called "thyrings" in and through the barrier above mentioned for the purpose of giving air to the Avon Eitha Colliery. The defendant became the occupier of Avon Eitha without any privity either of contract or of estate between him and his predecessors Evan Jones and partners. At the time when the defendant became such occupier there was a large subterranean body of water in Avon Eitha which communicated with and was fed by springs in the neighbourhood. This body of water was on a higher level than the chambers of Avon Eitha, and separated from them by a thick horizontal bar of coal which was part of Avon Eitha Colliery. The chambers of Avon Eitha were on a higher level than the "thyrings" above mentioned, and the "thyrings" were on a higher level than the chambers of Plas Bennion. The effect of removing the horizontal bar of coal in Avon Eitha would be that the water above mentioned would of itself flow into the chambers of Avon Eitha, and that a large portion of such water would also flow on of itself from the chambers of Avon Eitha through the "thyrings" into the chambers of Plas Bennion. The defendant, during his occupation, and before June, 1845, knowing that these "thyrings" were then open into Plas Bennion, and that the effect of removing the horizontal bar of coal in Avon Eitha would be as above stated, nevertheless did remove the said bar of coal for the purpose of obtaining the said coal, and so working his mine in the manner most advantageous to himself. In consequence of the removal of this horizontal bar of coal in Avon Eitha the water of itself flowed from the said subterranean body of water into the chambers of Avon Eitha, and one portion of the water which had so flowed into the chambers of Avon Eitha flowed on of itself through the "thyrings" into the chambers of Plas Bennion. Another portion of the water which so flowed into the chambers of Avon Eitha, and which if not obstructed in its natural course, would have flowed down to the bottom of Avon Eitha and below the "thyrings" was obstructed in its natural course by a dam which the defendant had placed in Avon Eitha and near to the "thyrings," and was thereby impelled through the "thyrings" into the chambers of Plas Bennion. This dam was removed before the commencement of the action next after mentioned, by some of the workmen of the Plas Bennion colliery. The vertical seam of coal above mentioned as forming the eastern boundary of Plas Bennion would have been sufficient to have prevented the said flow of water into Plas Bennion if the "thyrings" had not been made as aforesaid in the said seam of coal by Evan Jones and his partners. B C D E F G

On June 4, 1845, the plaintiff brought an action on the case against the defendant for the injury caused to Plas Bennion by the flow of water as aforesaid. On Jan. 30, 1846, the defendant paid £70 into court and pleaded the payment in the usual form; and on Mar. 28 in the same year the plaintiff replied accepting the said payment in satisfaction. The record in that action forms part of this case. The present action was brought on April 30, 1846. Since the commencement of the first action, and up to the time of the commencement of the present action, water has, in consequence of the removal of the said horizontal bar of coal in Avon Eitha, occasionally flowed of itself in the manner already stated from the said subterranean body of water adjoining to Avon Eitha into the chambers of Avon Eitha and so also flowed on of itself through the "thyrings" into the chambers of Plas Bennion in manner as before stated, and the colliery of Plas Bennion has been thereby injured. With respect to the sufficiency of the said vertical seam of coal forming the eastern boundary of Plas Bennion as a subsisting barrier to prevent the last-mentioned flow of water, if the "thyrings" had not been made in the said barrier, and with respect to the defendant's knowledge that the "thyrings" continued open, the facts are the same as before stated with reference to the former action. H I

The claim of the plaintiff to compensation in this case is advanced upon two grounds: first, on the supposed duty of the defendant, arising out of the act of

A Evan Jones, in removing the plaintiff's barrier, and the subsequent occupation of the same by the defendant; and secondly, on the general liability said to be imposed by law upon the defendant, in being responsible for the injury done, to the adjoining colliery, by water casually introduced into his own, in consequence of the working of his colliery.

B As to the first point it is to be observed, there was no privity of any kind, between Evan Jones and the defendant; the act done by Evan Jones was not on the premises now occupied by the defendant, but on those of the plaintiff; nor does the defendant derive his title to the premises he occupies in any way from Evan Jones. In the Special Case it is expressly stated there is no privity of any kind between Evan Jones and the defendant. In Rosewall v. Prior (1), the defendant was tenant for years, and erected on his own premises that which was a nuisance to the plaintiff's house; and then made an under lease; and it was held that the plaintiff might sue either the defendant or the sub-lessee. On the same principle, if Evan Jones did any thing in Avon Eitha colliery, which made the premises in their then state a nuisance to the plaintiff's colliery, the defendant, as occupier, might have been made responsible for continuing them in the same state, and so upholding the nuisance. But this is a very different case. The premises occupied by the plaintiff are not a nuisance, and the act done by Evan Jones, which is an injury to the plaintiff, was upon the plaintiff's soil, where he, the defendant would have no right to go, even if he wished it, for the purpose of remedying the evil Evan Jones had formerly done. We think there is no special duty in the defendant to protect against water the plaintiff's mine, when he occupied Avon Eitha, in consequence of his having succeeded in such occupation Evan Jones who removed the plaintiff's barriers.

E The next ground on which it was contended that the defendant was liable, is broader; namely, that he was, of common right, bound to prevent the water coming into his own mine from flowing into his neighbour's. In considering this question, it is important to remark that in the Special Case it is stated that the defendant worked out the coal, which protected his own mine from the subterranean body of water, for the purpose of obtaining the coal, and so making the mine in a manner beneficial to himself; there is nothing from which we can infer that that was an unusual or negligent mode of proceeding, or done with any design to injure his neighbour's mine. In order to establish the proposition that the defendant was bound to prevent the flowing of the water into the plaintiff's mine, Tenant v. Goldwin (2) was relied on. That was an action on the case, in which the plaintiff declared that he was possessed of a messuage, in which a cellar was built to lay coals, etc., and that the cellar adjoined the defendant's messuage, and by the wall of the defendant the cellar was separated and divided from the defendant's privy, and for want of repairing the wall the filth flowed through into the plaintiff's cellar. There was judgment by default, and damages were assessed upon a writ of inquiry; then there was a motion in arrest of judgment, and the declaration was held sufficient. LORD HOLT said:

H "It was the defendant's wall and the defendant's filth, and that he was bound of common right to keep the wall so as not to damnify the property of his neighbour; and it was a trespass on his neighbour, as if his beasts should escape, or one should make a great heap on the border of his ground, and it should tumble and roll down upon his neighbour's."

I That was, therefore, a very different case from the present. There was no barrier between the plaintiff's mine and the defendant's, which the latter could repair, and the flow of water into the plaintiff's mine cannot be considered a trespass. Again, the declaration in that case was held good, on account of the words debet reparandum, which are inapplicable to the present one. But for the removal of part of the barrier of coal that existed in the plaintiff's mine, the water in the defendant's mine would have done no harm, and for that removal the defendant is not responsible.

A great many cases were referred to in the argument, independently of all question as to the removal of the barrier to show that the defendant was bound at all events to take care that the water which flowed in his own mine should not pass into another's. Turberville v. Stampe (3), Vaughan v. Menlove (4), Sutton v. Clarke (5), Boyle v. Tamlyn (6), Brown v. Windsor (7), Dodd v. Holme (8), and other cases were referred to. In each of these the negligence imputed to the defendant in doing the act on his own premises had proved injurious to his neighbours; but there is here nothing to show any negligence on the part of the defendant in working the colliery.

A case quoted from the YEAR BOOK (Anon. (9)), in Lambert and Olliot v. Bessey (10) (T. Raym. at p. 422), was relied on as authority for the plaintiff, where negligence was imputed to the defendant; but on examination of the original report in the YEAR BOOK it appears to us hardly to support that statement. It was an action of trespass on the plaintiff's close, and for damaging the grass, etc., the defendant justified for that he had a close separated from the plaintiff's by a thorn hedge, and when cutting the thorns they fell invite solo into the plaintiff's close, wherefore he entered into the close to take them away. After much discussion it was held that in order to make the plea good, not only must the thorns have fallen invite solo, but that he did all in his power to prevent their falling into the plaintiff's soil.

Haward v. Bankes (11) was said to be a direct authority for the plaintiff; but it is not so. The decision of the court was given on a count charging the defendant with having caused water to flow through divers other collieries into the plaintiff's, which was a count in case; and it is true that the plaintiff recovered in that action; and, though there can be no doubt that a man may cause water to flow into his neighbour's premises, so as to make him liable to an action—as for instance, by erecting a mound of earth, and giving it a certain direction, as appears to have been done by the present defendant, before the former action was commenced, in which he paid money into court as compensation; in this case it cannot be said he caused, but that he permitted the water to flow into the plaintiff's mine.

Another case relied on by the plaintiff was Firmstone v. Wheeley (12), which also differs from this case in a material particular, namely, that the defendant had removed from the plaintiff's mine, by trespass, a barrier of coal, which, had it existed, would have prevented the water flowing from the defendant's mine to the plaintiff's, and though hardly to be treated as a decision, the Court of Exchequer appear to have thought the defendant, having wrongfully removed the barrier, he was bound to protect the plaintiff's mine against the flowing in of the water; and if this action had been against Evan Jones, who had occupied Avon Eitha, it might have been urged as an authority against him, but if Evan Jones had been sued in trespass for removing the barrier, a second action could not have been maintained against him for the consequential damage: see Clegg v. Dearden (13). If no such action could be maintained against him, it would be singular if it could be maintained against a party not in any way connected with him, for consequential damages arising from his act of trespass.

Treating the question as a new one, not governed by the authority of any decided case (for all those referred to are distinguishable), it would seem to be the natural right of each of the owners of the two adjoining coal-mines, neither being subject to servitude to the other, to work his own mine in the most beneficial manner to himself, though the natural consequence may be that some prejudice would accrue to the owner of the adjoining mine, so long as it does not arise from negligent or malicious conduct.

In the present case it could not be disputed that but for the excavation of the plaintiff's coal the defendant would have been entitled to work out his own coal: for if the space which it occupied afterwards became filled with water it would have done no harm to the plaintiff if his own coal actually had not been excavated. If he afterwards excavated his own, and if the water flowed in from the defendant's working his own coal he would not have any right of action for the damage. His

A position would be similar to that suggested by LORD HOLT, in the case before mentioned of Tenant v. Goldwin (2), where he says :

“The case indeed might possibly be such that the defendant might not be bound to repair; as if the defendant made a new cellar under the defendant's old privy or in a vacant piece of ground which lay next the old privy before, in such case the plaintiff must defend himself.”

B Though here, however, the working of the two mines had been simultaneous; but then the defendant's mine, not being subject to any servitude, what authority is there for saying that the plaintiff by working his coal could alter or abridge the defendant's right to work his own. It is certainly a reasonable thing that the plaintiff should leave part of his own coal to protect his own working against the influx of water; the plaintiff took that view of the matter and left a barrier; and, C in his opinion, it would have been sufficient for the purpose if it had not been broken through by a wrongdoer, for whose act the defendant is not responsible.

There are many cases in which the principle is recognised that one landowner by altering the condition of his land cannot deprive the owner of the adjoining land of the privilege of using his own as he might have done before; thus, he cannot by D building a house near the margin of his land, prevent his neighbour from excavating his own land, though it may endanger his house, or from working on his own land, though it may subsequently prejudice him, unless, from the lapse of time, the adjoining land has become subject to a right analogous to what it would have been in the case of a qualified servitude: see Acton v. Blundell (14), where the subject was very much discussed; and the court held that one landowner, having dug a well E on his own land, could not maintain an action against a party who afterwards sunk a coal-pit in the neighbourhood, which had the effect of draining the water away from the well, the act not being done by the defendant negligently or maliciously, but in a proper manner, for the purpose of winning his own coal. We think the same principle is applicable to the present case. Water is said to be a common enemy (R. v. Pagham Sussex Sewers Comrs. (15), per LORD TENTERDEN, C.J., 8 B. & C. at p. 360), against which each man must defend himself. This is in F accordance with the civil law. It was considered that land on the lower level owed a natural servitude to that on the higher level, in respect of receiving and claiming compensation for water naturally flowing down: COMYNS' DIGEST, 39, title 3.

Other points were explained to the court in the Special Case, but of which little was said on the argument—namely, that the defendant, by paying money into G court in the former action, had precluded himself from saying he was not liable to be sued in this action; but, in looking to the declaration, he was charged with turning water into the plaintiff's mine, for which he was responsible; and the admission of that in that action can have no bearing on this. On the whole, we are of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and that the judgment H must be for the defendant.

Judgment for defendant.

Mistake—Mistake of fact—Contract for sale of cargo of wheat—Cargo not in existence at date of contract—Repudiation by buyer.

H. sold, on del credere commission, a cargo of corn to A., the bought note describing it as of average quality "when shipped," and the price including freight and insurance to a safe port in the United Kingdom. Before the date of the sale the corn had been sold abroad, owing to its having become heated during the voyage. A., on hearing this, repudiated the contract, and H. was sued by his principal for the price.

Held: at the date of the contract the parties contemplated that there was in existence a cargo to be bought and sold, but in fact at that date there was no such cargo, and, therefore, A. was entitled to repudiate the contract and consequently the action against H. failed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, infra, on a bill of exceptions to a ruling of MARTIN, B., in an action for breach of contract.

- C The action was brought by the plaintiffs, merchants at Smyrna, to recover the price of a cargo of Indian corn sold for the plaintiffs by the defendants as factors, the purchase having been repudiated by the purchaser. The cargo in question had been shipped on account of the plaintiffs at Salonica on board a vessel chartered by them, and bound for the United Kingdom. The plaintiffs, through Messrs. Bernoulli, their London agents, employed the defendants as cornfactors, to sell the
- D cargo on a del credere commission, which was done on May 15, 1848, one A. B. Callander being the purchaser. A few days afterwards it was discovered by the purchaser that the cargo had, previously to his entering into the contract, been unloaded in consequence of its being in a heated state, and sold on account of the plaintiffs at Tunis. He, therefore, repudiated the contract. The contract was in these terms:

- E “Bought of Hastie and H. a cargo of about 1,180 qrs. of Salonica Indian corn, of fair average quality when shipped from Salonica. Bill of lading dated, . . . Free on board to a safe port in the United Kingdom . . .”

- At the trial before MARTIN, B., no evidence was given to show that the language used in the contract meant any other than its ordinary meaning, except that the
- F words “free on board” meant that the goods were on board the vessel. The judge directed the jury that the meaning and construction of the contract with Callander was, that Callander, as purchaser, was to take on himself all risks from the date of the shipment of the corn; and that the meaning and construction of the contract was that the purchaser bought the cargo if it existed at the date of the contract, but that, if it had been damaged or lost, he bought the benefit of the insurance, but
- G no more; and that, by selling the cargo, the vendor undertook that the purchaser should have it if it existed, and that the vendor had not sold it before to another. The judge further ruled that, if the jury believed the evidence, the sale of the cargo at Tunis in this case by the agent of the plaintiffs was not such a sale as to defeat the contract, and that it was rendered necessary in consequence of sea damage, and was made merely to prevent the loss being so great as it would
- H otherwise necessarily have been. He, therefore, directed a verdict for the defendants.

- The case was afterwards argued in the Court of Exchequer (8 Exch. 40) before POLLOCK, C.B., PARKE and ALDERSON, BB., when the learned judges differed in opinion, and a rule was drawn up directing that the verdict found for the defendants should be set aside on all the pleas except the sixth, and that on that plea judgment
- I should be entered for the plaintiffs, non obstante veredicto, and that the defendants should be at liberty to treat the decision of the court as the ruling at nisi prius, and to put it on the record and bring a bill of exceptions. This was done, and the Lord Chief Baron sealed the bill of exceptions, adding, however, a memorandum to the effect that he did so as the ruling of the court, but that his own opinion was in opposition to such ruling.

Butt (Bovill with him) for the defendants.

Cowling for the plaintiffs.

June 25, 1853. COLERIDGE, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—The case was originally tried before MARTIN, B., who, in directing the jury, ruled that the contract imported that, at the time of the sale, the corn was in existence as such, and capable of delivery, and a verdict was found for the defendants, the plaintiffs having leave to move to enter a verdict in their favour on all the issues except those on the fifth and sixth pleas, and on those pleas for judgment non obstante veredicto. The case was argued before POLLOCK, C.B., and PARKE and ALDERSON, BB. The Lord Chief Baron agreed in the opinion expressed by MARTIN, B., at nisi prius; but the other learned barons differed from him, and made the rule absolute; whereupon it was agreed that the question should be brought before this court on a bill of exceptions, as if the Lord Chief Baron had directed the jury in conformity with the opinion of PARKE and ALDERSON, BB. B

The case, therefore, comes before us without any great preponderance of authority in favour of the plaintiffs. Nor do we find in the arguments of counsel, or in the judgment of the court below, any case referred to upon which that judgment was founded. It turned entirely on the meaning of the contract made between the parties, which was in these terms: C

"Bought of Hastie & Hutchinson a cargo of about 1,180 quarters of Salonica Indian corn of fair average quality when shipped per the 'Kezia Page,' Captain Page, from Salonica, bill of lading dated Feb. 22, at 27s. per quarter, free on board, and including freight and insurance to a safe port in the United Kingdom, the vessel calling at Cork or Falmouth for orders, measure to be calculated as customary, payment at two months from this date, or in cash, less discount at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum for the unexpired time upon handing shipping documents." D

An attempt was made to explain this document by evidence, but failed. There is, indeed, an expression in the bill of exceptions, "that the meaning of free on board is, that the goods are on board which taken literally, may import that they are on board at the time when the words are used; but it was not contended for the defendants that such is the true meaning. The case, therefore, is not affected by that statement and the question depends upon the words of the contract, unexplained by any evidence. E

For the defendants it was contended that the parties plainly contracted for the sale and purchase of goods, that the price to be paid was for goods, and that for the price the purchaser was to have the benefit of a contract to carry them and a policy of insurance; that a vendor of goods undertakes that they exist, and that they are capable of being transferred, although he may not stipulate for their condition; and that as the goods in question had been sold and delivered to other parties before the contract in question was made, there was nothing on which it could operate; and Barr v. Gibson (1) and Strickland v. Turner (Executrix of Lane) (2) were cited. F

On the other hand it was argued, that this was not a mere contract for the sale of an ascertained cargo, but that the purchaser bought the adventure, and took upon himself all risks from the shipment of the cargo. It was said that the mention of the condition of the cargo at the time of shipment was a proof of the intention of the parties that the buyer should take all risks from that time; that its condition at the time of sale, or the fact of its existence, could not then be ascertained, and therefore the purchaser must be supposed to have taken the risks; that if it had existed, however much deteriorated, the purchaser must have taken it, although the loss had been all but total, and therefore there was no reason for excluding total loss from the risks that he was to bear; that if it had ceased to exist the consideration would not fail, for the purchaser would have the shipping documents. It was further argued that the stipulation for payment, which would probably have to be made before the arrival of the cargo, indicated an intention that the purchaser was in all events to pay for it, on account of the inconvenience that would ensue G

A if he might have to reclaim the money back. It was not disputed that Barr v. Gibson (1) and Strickland v. Turner (Executrix of Lane) (2) were well decided.

It appears to us that the contract in question was for the sale of a cargo supposed to exist, and to be capable of transfer, and that, inasmuch as it had been sold and delivered to others by the captain before the contract in question was made, the plaintiffs cannot recover in this action. With regard to the description of the cargo as "of fair average quality when shipped," we think that, if those words had not been introduced, it must have been held that the purchaser of a cargo on a voyage would take upon himself the chance of what its condition at the time of purchase might be, and that this clause was introduced for his benefit, by enabling him to object, if the fact were so, that the cargo was bad when shipped. If, in Barr v. Gibson (1), there had been a stipulation that the ship, when she sailed on the voyage during which she was sold, was seaworthy, that would not have made the purchaser liable, if a total loss had occurred before the contract was entered into. It has been said, that if the loss had been all but total, if the cargo had become all but worthless, yet, if it existed in specie, the purchaser must unquestionably have been bound, and, therefore, there is no reason for holding that he was not also to take the risk of a total loss. The same argument would have applied in Strickland v. Turner (Executrix of Lane) (2). If the annuitant, at the time of the sale of the annuity, had been in extremis, and had died the next hour, the purchaser would have been bound and could not have recovered the purchase-money, but was held to be so entitled, the annuitant having died before the sale. Again, it has been supposed that there is an inconsistency in saying that, if the cargo had sustained sea-damage, constituting an average loss covered by the policy, it would pass to the purchaser so as to secure to him an indemnity, but would not pass in the event of a total loss. This seems to depend upon the same point, and not to be attended with any real difficulty.

If the contract for sale of the cargo was valid, the shipping documents would pass as accessories to it; but if, in consequence of the previous sale of the cargo, the contract failed as to the principal subject-matter of it, the shipping documents would not pass. Although we cannot find any decision in point, there is Sutherland v. Pratt (3), where this subject was mentioned. In that case, the plaintiff had bought goods on a voyage, and effected an insurance, lost or not lost. They had sustained sea damage before the sale, and the purchaser sued on the policy. The underwriters pleaded that the goods were damaged before the plaintiff had acquired any interest in them. On demurrer, it was held that the plea was bad, but the very learned counsel who argued for the plaintiff admitted, in answer to a question put by PARKE, B., that, if the goods had been totally lost before his contract of purchase was made, there would not have been an insurable interest, as a person cannot buy a thing that has been totally lost.

For these reasons, it appears to us that the basis of the contract in this case was the sale and purchase of goods, and that all the other terms in the bought note were dependent upon that, and that we cannot give to it the effect of a contract for goods lost or not lost. The consequence is that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and entered for the defendants according to arrangement between the parties.

The plaintiffs appealed to the House of Lords.

I The following judges attended the House upon the argument. ALDERSON, B., WIGHTMAN, CRESSWELL, ERLE and WILLIAMS, JJ., MARTIN, B., CROMPTON and WILLES, JJ., and BRAMWELL, B.

Sir Frederick Thesiger, Q.C., and J. Wilde, Q.C., for the appellants.

Butt, Q.C., and Bovill, Q.C., for the respondents, were not called on to argue.

At the conclusion of the appellants' argument the House put the following question to the learned judges: Whether looking at this record judgment should be given for the appellants or the respondents? The learned judges delivered their opinion by

ALDERSON, B.—Her Majesty's judges are unanimously of opinion that the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber was right, and that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer was wrong; and I am myself now of the same opinion, having been one of the judges before whom the cause was argued in the court below. A

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—That being so, I have no hesitation in advising your Lordships, and at once moving that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed. It is hardly necessary, and it has not ordinarily been usual, for your Lordships to go much into the merits of a judgment which is thus unanimously affirmed by the judges who assist the House in forming its judgment. B

I may state shortly that the whole question turns on the construction of the contract which was entered into between the parties. I do not mean to deny that many plausible and ingenious arguments have been pressed by both counsel who have addressed your Lordships, showing that there might have been a meaning attached to that contract different from that which the words themselves import. C If this had depended not merely on the construction of the contract, but on evidence which, if I recollect rightly, was rejected at the trial, of what mercantile usage had been, I should not have been prepared to say that a long-continued mercantile usage interpreting such contracts might not have been sufficient to warrant, or even compel your Lordships to adopt a different construction. D But, in the absence of any such evidence, looking to the contract itself alone, it appears to me clearly that what the parties contemplated—those who bought and those who sold—was that there was an existing something to be sold and bought, and if sold and bought, then the benefit of insurance should go with it.

I do not feel pressed by the latter argument which has been brought forward very ably by counsel for the appellants, derived from the subject of insurance. E I think the full benefit of the insurance was meant to go as well to losses and damage that occurred previously to May 15 as to losses and damage that occurred subsequently, always assuming that something passed by the contract of May 15. F If the contract of May 15 had been an operating contract, and there had been a valid sale of a cargo at that time existing, the purchaser would have had the benefit of insurance in respect of all damage previously occurring. The contract plainly imports that there was something which was to be sold at the time of the contract, and something to be purchased. No such thing existing, I am of opinion, that the Court of Exchequer Chamber has come to the only reasonable conclusion on it, and consequently that there must be judgment for the respondents.

Appeal dismissed.

Will—Evidence—Evidence to explain and identify reference in codicil to previous document—Invalid will—Validation—Republication by and incorporation in valid codicil.

A testamentary paper which, owing to its not having been duly attested as required by s. 9 of the Wills Act, 1837, is not a valid will, can, provided it is capable of identification, be rendered valid by a codicil which clearly refers to it and is itself duly executed. Parol evidence is admissible to establish in a court of construction the meaning of the reference in the codicil to the earlier document and the identity of that document. In effect, the earlier document is validated by being incorporated in or republished by the codicil.

In 1851 the testatrix signed a document commencing: "This is the last will and testament of Mrs. A. F.," but one witness only attested it, and, therefore, it did not constitute a valid will. In 1856 F. executed a codicil beginning: "This is a codicil to my last will and testament," and this codicil was duly attested and valid. The testatrix died, leaving no other will than the document first mentioned, which was found in a drawer in her bedroom in an envelope endorsed "Mrs. A. F.'s will."

Held: parol evidence was admissible to prove the identity of the document referred to by the codicil, so as to incorporate it.

Appeal from an order of the judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury admitting to probate two papers as a will and codicil (Dea. & Sw. 325).

On Dec. 1, 1851, Anne, the wife of Joseph Emanuel Allen, who was separated from her husband and had assumed and was known by the name of Foote, drew up in her own handwriting, and signed and sealed a paper of that date, described in its commencement as "the last will and testament of Mrs. Anne Foote, of Bath, which I make and publish for all my worldly substance." By this instrument she gave several legacies, and appointed executors, but made no disposition of the remainder of her property. She had a power, under the settlement made on her marriage, to make a will, but the paper in question was attested by only one witness, and was, therefore, not valid. On Sept. 13, 1856, being then on her deathbed, she executed a codicil headed: "This is a codicil to my last will and testament." By the codicil she gave to her servant Eliza Baker the sum of £100, "with as much of my furniture as, in the opinion of my executor, will be sufficient to furnish a sitting-room and a bedroom." The codicil appointed no executor, and contained no other reference to the will. On Sept. 14, the testatrix died. On her death search was made for her testamentary papers by Sir H. Maddock, who was one of the executors appointed by the paper described as her will, and to whom, in pursuance of the testatrix's direction, a letter announcing the event had been sent immediately upon her death. The codicil was found in a chest in her bedroom, and the disputed paper was found in another chest which had been, shortly before her death, removed from her bedroom into an adjoining room. This paper was enclosed

A in a sealed envelope, on which were written the words—"Mrs. Anne Foote's will." No other testamentary paper of any description was found. The two papers mentioned were admitted to probate by the judge of the Prerogative Court, and against this sentence the present appeal was brought as regards the will.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly and Dr. Jenner for the appellant.

C The Rt. Hon. T. PEMBERTON LEIGH.—The objection relied on is that there is no such distinct reference to this paper in the codicil as to enable the court to receive parol evidence in order to identify it; that it is not identified by the description of a will, for that, in truth, it is not a will; that it is not identified either by date or by any reference to its contents, or by annexation to the codicil, so as to distinguish it from other papers of a like description, if more than one were found; and that to admit this paper to probate on the ground that no other is produced to satisfy the description would be to incorporate the will in the codicil merely by parol evidence and not by the effect of the reference contained in the codicil itself.

D It becomes necessary to examine, with some minuteness, the rules of law and the decided cases applicable to this subject. Before the Wills Act was passed in 1837 no formalities of any kind being necessary in the execution of a will or codicil as to personal estate, the effect of a well-executed testamentary instrument upon one not well executed could hardly come before a Court of Probate. But such questions arose very frequently in the temporal courts, with respect to the disposition of real estate, and the statute alluded to having placed wills, as to real and personal property on the same footing, it should seem that the authorities upon this point with respect to real estate, whether before or since the statute in the courts of law, are now equally applicable to the Court of Probate, with regard to personalty. E In considering them, however, it is necessary to bear in mind this distinction between cases before the Act and subsequent cases, viz., that before the Act a testamentary paper not executed so as to affect real estate was valid as to personalty, was really a will or codicil, and might, therefore, strictly answer that description in a subsequent reference to it by that name, whereas since the Act came into operation no paper not properly executed and attested, can, in strictness, be for any purpose a will or codicil. It is necessary also to remember the distinction between the admissibility of evidence to prove a testamentary paper and of evidence to explain its meaning—that direct evidence of intention, declarations of the testator by word or in writing, and other testimony of a similar character, are admissible when the will is disputed, but that no such evidence can be received in order to explain the expressions which he has used. Still, in construing his will, the court is entitled and is bound to place itself in the situation of the testator with respect to his property, the objects of his bounty, and every other circumstance material to the construction of the will, and for this purpose to receive, if occasion require it, parol evidence of these circumstances, and to expound his meaning with reference to them. F G H

I In the celebrated treatise of SIR JAMES WIGRAM (EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE IN AID OF THE INTERPRETATION OF WILLS) these rules are stated, discussed and explained in a manner which has excited the admiration of every judge who has had to consult it. After collecting and stating the effect of the several authorities, SIR JAMES WIGRAM sums up (as it appears to us with perfect accuracy) the result in these terms (prop. 5, para. 96):

"Every claimant under a will has a right to require that a court of construction, in the execution of its office, shall, by means of extrinsic evidence, place itself in the situation of the testator, the meaning of whose language it is called upon to declare. It follows that, if with the light which that situation alone affords, the testator's meaning can be determined by a court, the court which so determines does in effect declare that the testator has expressed his intention with certainty, or, in other words, that his will is free from ambiguity."

It may be said that on the present occasion, the Court of Probate is, to a certain extent, a court of construction, for it has to determine what is the meaning of the reference made by the testatrix in her codicil to her last will and testament (the executor under which is to determine upon one of the gifts in the codicil), and whether any, and, if any, what, instrument found at her death is thereby referred to. This question is one of fact which obviously must be explained, and can only be explained by parol evidence. A

At first sight there is no difficulty; there is no ambiguity whatever in the expression by which the reference is made. Parol evidence must necessarily be received to prove whether there is or is not in existence at the testatrix's death any such instrument as is referred to by the codicil. For this purpose, inquiry must be made and evidence must be offered to show what papers there were at the date of the codicil, which could answer the description contained in the codicil, and, the court having by these means placed itself in the situation of the testatrix, and acquired, as far as possible, all the knowledge which the testatrix possessed, must say, upon a consideration of those extrinsic circumstances, whether the paper is identified or not. If the will in question had been properly executed, there can be no doubt that it would have been treated as the instrument referred to by the codicil; yet it must, in that case, have been proved or assumed that there was no later will revoking it. This last fact is one which is in truth a necessary foundation of the establishment of every testamentary paper. That a description in a will may be applied to a subject inaccurately described in it, if it should be shown by parol evidence that there is no subject to which it applies with accuracy, can admit of no doubt. B C D

"If the description in the will is incorrect, evidence that a subject having such and such marks upon it exists, must be admissible, that the court may determine whether such subject, though incorrectly described in the will, be that which the testator intended": E

WIGRAM, prop. 5, para. 64.

Is then the evidence in this case sufficient to identify the paper propounded as the will? No other paper has been found to which the description can apply. Here is a paper kept by the testatrix up to the time of her death in her own possession, to which, according to her view of that paper, it does apply with the strictest accuracy. If we are to read the codicil with the knowledge of what the testatrix knew—viz., that she had this testamentary paper and that she had no other—can it be doubted that this is the paper referred to? It is said, however, that this is merely the effect of parol evidence, and that there may be other wills, and that if there were two there is nothing in this codicil to distinguish which was the will referred to. Unless there were two, both imperfectly executed and both of the same date (not a very probable event), the question could not arise. As we have already observed, the efficacy of every will, as a last will, depends upon the fact that there is none later. The proof of this must, in all cases, be negative, and necessarily of very different weight, sometimes amounting almost to certainty, as when the will is made on the death-bed; sometimes open to great doubt, as when the will has been made many years before the death; but in every case the court admitting the instrument to probate must be satisfied that it is the last will. Supposing the paper propounded as a will in this case had been executed a few hours before the codicil, and that there was positive proof that the testatrix signed no other paper till she signed the codicil, the objection which is now made would, in law, be precisely of the same force. It has not been disputed that, if the codicil had identified the paper, by describing it as containing certain bequests, such reference would have been sufficient to let in the proof, yet in such case the proof would equally depend on the assumption that there was no later will which contained similar bequests. No doubt the rule of law is as stated by LORD ELDON in Smart v. Prujean (1) (6 Ves. at p. 565) that F G H I

A "an instrument properly attested, in order to incorporate another instrument not attested, must describe it so as to be a manifestation of what the paper is which is meant to be incorporated."

For this purpose it is necessary that it should be so described as to leave no doubt in the mind of the judge, on the circumstances as they actually existed and are proved before him, that the paper referred to is the paper propounded. In Smart v. Prujean (1) the testator directed by his will the proceeds of his real estate to be applied to such purposes as he should appoint by a private letter, which he stated in his will he intended to leave with the abbess of a convent named or her successor. This will, according to the statement of it in the report, does not seem necessarily to have referred to any particular paper then in existence. The letter which he declared his intention to leave might be either one which he had already written or one which he intended to write. In point of fact the testator never deposited any letter in the custody mentioned in his will, but at his death two papers were found in an envelope, which enclosed also his will, one being a letter addressed to his executors, and another a letter addressed to the abbess in question, both documents bearing date some months before his will, and one of them mentioning that he had devised his worldly estate and effects to trustees upon the uses mentioned in the letter. The letter, therefore, in terms, referred to a will already made, and could hardly be construed to refer to the will actually produced, which was dated many months afterwards. Nor had the letter been delivered over to the abbess, which LORD ELDON thought, by the terms of the will, was an essential part of the condition to give it validity. He, therefore, very naturally asked, if other letters had been proved, how could these be distinguished from them? He did not on this occasion express any doubt that parol evidence might be received, provided the reference in the will was to a paper already existing and sufficiently identified.

In a subsequent case, however, if LORD ELDON's observations are accurately reported, he appears to have intimated some doubt whether a paper antecedently existing, and clearly and undeniably referred to, could be made part of the will: F Wilkinson v. Adam (2), 1 Ves. & B. at p. 445; but, if any such doubt was ever thrown out, later decisions removed it, and completely established the rule that, before the Wills' Act, 1837, a paper distinctly referred to by a will might be incorporated in it. A reference by a testator to his last will is a reference in its own nature to one instrument to the exclusion of all others; if so, the description identifies the instrument. It is not like a general reference to codicils of which there may be several. In the numerous cases to be found on the subject of republication of a will by a codicil duly executed, and which, in effect, is equivalent to a re-execution of the former instrument, it has never been held necessary that the codicil should refer to the particular paper containing the will, so as to distinguish it from all other wills.

H "The testator's acknowledgment of his former will considered as his will at the execution of the codicil, if not directly expressed in that instrument, must be implied from the nature of the instrument itself, because, by the nature of it, it supposes a former will, refers to it, and becomes part of it, and, being attested by three witnesses, his implied declaration and acknowledgment seem also to be attested by three."

I It was decided in that case that the republication of a will by a codicil was not only a recognition of the will, but had the effect of a re-execution, so as to make the will speak as from the date of the codicil, and to give a different meaning to a general devise of lands from that which it previously had.

To this doctrine SIR WILLIAM GRANT, though he felt himself obliged to yield to authority, was much opposed, and when he had to consider Barnes v. Crowe (3) in Pigott v. Waller (4), he urged very strong reasons against the principle of that decision; but that a codicil to a will, though not referring to it, recognises a preceding will, and amounts to a republication, he does not intimate any doubt. His words are (7 Ves. at p. 118):

"A direct republication, or re-execution, is an unequivocal act, making the will operate precisely as if it was executed on the day of republication. But a reference to the will proves only that the deviser recognises the existence of a will, which the act of making a codicil necessarily implies; not that he means to give it any new operation, or do more by speaking of it than he had already done by executing it."

He afterwards observes (ibid. at p. 120):

"The Lords Commissioners, in Barnes v. Crowe (3), appear to have held that every codicil, duly attested, ought to be held a republication. Their opinion seems to be that the codicil was incorporated with the will. The general proposition referred to by LORD COMMISSIONER EYRE is that the execution of a codicil should, in all cases, be an implied republication."

In Doe d. Williams v. Evans (5), a testator prepared a will which he did not sign, and about a fortnight afterwards duly executed a codicil on the same sheet of paper, commencing with these words: "Codicil. I, David Evans, make a codicil to the foregoing will"; and it was held that the codicil operated to incorporate and establish the will. BAYLEY, B., in giving judgment, observes (1 Cr. & M. at p. 45):

"The will was written on a sheet of foolscap paper, and the codicil was written on the same sheet. Now, if the codicil had not referred to the will, I should have thought that it did not set up that instrument, but if the codicil do refer to the will, then I am of opinion that it does set it up. The language is 'Codicil: I, David Evans, make a codicil,' which word implies an addition to a former instrument. It proceeds—'a codicil to the foregoing will.' The testator, by executing this codicil, appears to me at that time, in as plain terms as possible, to have set up, not only the codicil, but the will."

In this case there was a distinct reference to the particular paper referred to in such a manner as to exclude all doubt of the instrument intended; but in Guest v. Willasey (6), this circumstance was wanting. A testator there made his will, duly attested. On the back of this will he wrote three codicils, two unattested, and the last attested. The last codicil revoked the appointment of an executor made by the second codicil, but did not otherwise refer either to the will or codicil. The court was of opinion that the last codicil operated as a republication, not only of the will and of the second codicil, but also of the first.

It is true that in both these cases the several writings were all upon the same sheet of paper, but when the difficulty arises from an absence of the ceremonies required by the Statute of Frauds, this circumstance does not seem of much importance. It may greatly facilitate the identification—it may make the evidence more conclusive, but it can hardly make it more admissible. Accordingly, it does not seem to have been thought necessary in subsequent cases. In Gordon v. Lord Reay (7), a testator made his will, dated Aug. 17, 1812, duly executed and attested, by which he devised £10,000 to the plaintiff, charged on certain estates. He afterwards made a codicil, unattested, dated April 8, 1814, by which, reciting that he had sold the estates so charged, he ordered that the legacies should be paid out of and charged on his other real estates. On Aug. 13, 1818, he made a second codicil, duly executed and attested, by which he confirmed the provisions made by his will bearing date Aug. 17, 1812, in favour of the plaintiff, but took no notice of the codicil of April 8, 1814; yet it was held that a codicil being in law a part of a will, the second codicil, by confirming the will, established the first codicil so as to charge the £10,000 legacy on the real estates.

This case was decided in 1832. In the subsequent case of Utterton v. Robins (8), which was argued before the Queen's Bench on a case sent from Chancery in 1834, a question of the same kind arose. In that case the testator made a will dated Sept. 12, 1823, properly executed and attested, and after devising a house to his

A daughter, Mrs. Utterton, gave the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees. By a memorandum in pencil in the margin of his will, dated Aug. 6, 1825, signed, but not attested, the testator, reciting that he had sold the house given by the will to his daughter, gave her instead of it a house in Portugal Street. He afterwards signed another unattested codicil, dated Aug. 9, 1825, to the same effect, and afterwards made several codicils properly executed and attested for the purpose of including in the operation of his will after-purchased estates. The last of these codicils was dated Feb. 5, 1830, and was in these words :

"I, John Robins, do make this fourth codicil to my will, which bears date Sept. 12, 1823. I give and devise all real estates and hereditaments purchased by me since the date and execution of my said will to the trustees therein named, their heirs and assigns, to the uses and upon the trusts in the said will expressed and declared, of and concerning the residue of my real estates."

C The house in Portugal Street had been purchased between the date of the will and of the codicil of Aug. 9, 1825, and the question for the consideration of the court was to whom the house in Portugal Street passed, it being contended, on the part of Mrs. Utterton that the last codicil, though not referring to any instrument but the will, operated as a republication of all the codicils, whether attested or unattested, and that the house in Portugal Street passed to Mrs. Utterton. Gordon v. Lord Reay (7) was not cited, and the court did not decide whether such codicil would or would not establish the unattested codicils not referred to, though PARKE, B., may be considered to have intimated an opinion against giving to the codicil what he terms "that immense effect in republication which Mrs. Utterton's counsel ascribed to it"; but the court held that, supposing the codicils in favour of Mrs. Utterton to have been duly attested, the last codicil would have revoked them, and devised the estate in question to the trustees under the will. The learned judges had no doubt that any testamentary paper unattested, sufficiently referred to by a duly executed and attested codicil, would be established by such codicil, though the two instruments were not only not on the same paper, but were not even in the same country. This is the result which we collect from the observations which fell from the judges in the course of the argument, though they contented themselves with sending a certificate of their opinions to the Court of Chancery as to the effect of the devise without assigning any reasons.

F In Radburn v. Jervis (9), decided by LORD LANGDALE, Guest v. Willasey (6), Gordon v. Lord Reay (7), and Utterton v. Robins (8), were all cited, and his Lordship was of opinion that a codicil duly executed and attested, though referring only to the will, operated to establish and republish all previous codicils, whether duly executed or not. The testator there made a will giving various legacies, and charging his real estates with all legacies thereby given. He made many codicils, some duly executed and attested, and some not, and by one of the latter class he gave a legacy to Mr. Brundrett. His eleventh codicil was duly executed and attested, and began in these words : "This is a further codicil to the last will and testament of me, Sir Thomas Clarges, Bart., made this 10th of April, 1828." The codicil was confined to revoking the appointment of two gentlemen named in the will as trustees and the legacies given to them, and to appointing Brundrett an executor and trustee in their stead. LORD LANGDALE held that the legacy to Brundrett was not charged on the real estates, because the codicil did not so charge it and the will charged only the legacies thereby given, but he was clearly of opinion that the last codicil operated as a republication of all the preceding codicils as well as of the will, though none of the codicils was referred to. His language is (3 Beav. at p. 460) :

"The object of the last codicil, which was duly executed and attested, was to revoke the appointment of trustees and executors named in the will and the bequests given to those trustees, and to appoint Mr. Brundrett to be executor and trustee, and though, in effect, it operated as a republication of the will and former codicils, and might have extended any prior general devise to lands subsequently acquired before the date of the last codicil, and have subjected such subsequently acquired lands to a general charge contained in the will; yet, considering it as a republication of the will and all the preceding codicils, I do not think the effect is to charge on the land legacies which by those codicils were not so charged."

Aaron v. Aaron (10), before KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., recognises the rule of law as established in Gordon v. Lord Reay (7), and treats it as not inconsistent with the decision in Utterton v. Robins (8), and his Lordship observes: "It can make no difference whether the codicil be written on the same paper with the will or not."

The cases to which we have referred all turned upon instruments anterior to the Wills Act, 1837, but they show that before that Act, in order to give validity against real estate to a testamentary instrument previously ineffectual for the purpose, such a general reference was sufficient as, when compared with the evidence produced, would enable the court to identify the document; that a codicil would operate as a republication of the will, and that a republication of a will would amount to a republication of whatever antecedent papers might answer the description of codicils, leaving it to be ascertained by parol evidence what might be the particular papers answering the description of either will or codicil. This doctrine was very much discussed in Hitchings v. Wood (11) before the Judicial Committee in 1841, and many valuable observations bearing upon this question were made by LORD LYNTHURST, though, as the case arose before the Act of 1837, and related only to personal estate, it has not the authority of a decision on the point in controversy. As to the certainty of the reference required by the law in the incorporating instrument, there does not seem to be much distinction under the Statute of Frauds between a will and any other instrument. In either case it is necessary, and it is sufficient that the description should be such as to enable the court, when the evidence is produced, to say what is the instrument intended.

In Shortrede v. Cheek (12), a guarantee in writing referred to "the promissory note," and evidence was offered of a particular promissory note, alleged to be the one in question. It was objected that the writing did not specify what promissory note was meant; that there might be more than one. But the opinion of the court was that, although, if there had been more than one, there would have been difficulty in admitting parol evidence to prove which note was meant, yet as only one was proved, and there was no evidence of any other, the description was sufficient. PARKE, J., observed, in answer to the argument, that there might be other notes (1 Ad. & El. at p. 60):

"Even if the note had been fully described, you might say that it was possible there might have been another note, and that the contrary should have been shown."

The same doctrine was carried still further by LORD LYNTHURST in Hodges v. Horsfall (13). A contract in writing was made, one of the terms of which related to the execution of certain buildings "as per plan agreed upon." In that case several plans had been drawn out, and discussed at different times, and it was doubtful which was the plan meant. LORD LYNTHURST, in a bill for specific performance of the contract, held, on the authority of Clinan v. Cooke (14), that parol evidence was admissible to prove which of the plans was intended, but he thought that the evidence was insufficient to identify the one insisted on, and on that ground dismissed the bill. It has been supposed that this case is open to criticism, on the ground that the contract did not of necessity refer to any writing, and that to ascertain, by parol evidence, which, of several documents, all answering the description, was intended, is going further than any former case, and is contrary to the opinion, or inclination of the opinion, of the judges in Shortrede v. Cheek (12): WIGRAM, prop. 7, para. 165, p. 127, n.

For the present purpose it is quite immaterial to consider the value of these objections. In the present case it is clear that the thing referred to is a writing; that it is in its nature a single instrument; and that only one document is found to answer the description. Shortrede v. Cheek (12) and Hodges v. Horsfall (13)

A are referred to by LORD COTTENHAM in Squire v. Campbell (15) (1 My. & Cr. at p. 480), as only establishing a principle which he seems to consider as settled, that when an agreement refers to some other document the identity of the thing referred to may be established by parol evidence. A reference in a will may be in such terms as to exclude parol testimony, as where it is to papers not yet written, or where the description is so vague as to be incapable of being applied to any instrument in particular, but the authorities seem clearly to establish that where there is a reference to any written document, described as then existing in such terms that it is capable of being ascertained, parol evidence is admissible to ascertain it, and the only question then is whether the evidence is sufficient for the purpose.

C Supposing the evidence to be admissible as the case would have stood under the Statute of Frauds, has the Act of 1837 altered the general law upon the subject? There are no words in the Act by which any such intention is declared. It has altered the mode in which the instrument containing the will is to be executed, but it has left untouched, as it appears to us, the question what papers are to be held included in the instrument so executed. The Statute of Frauds enacted that all devises of lands should be in writing and signed by the devisor, or by some other person in his presence and by his express directions, and should be attested and subscribed in his presence by three or four credible witnesses, or else they should be void. The Wills Act, 1837, provides that no will shall be valid unless it be in writing and signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator, or some other person in his presence and by his direction, and such signature shall be made or acknowledged in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time, and such witnesses shall attest and shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator, but no form of attestation shall be necessary. The ceremonies necessary to authenticate the instrument are altered, but no alteration is made in the effect to be given to words used in it.

F It would seem that a paper which would have been incorporated in a will executed according to the Statute of Frauds must now be incorporated in a will executed according to the new Act. In those instances in which the legislature was of opinion that the construction put by decided cases upon the Statute of Frauds as to the execution of wills, or the rules applied to devises contained in them, required alteration, provisions for that purpose were introduced into the Act. The incorporation of unattested documents by reference in an attested will was a subject of very great importance that had excited much attention, and the propriety of which had been sometimes doubted, at least to the extent to which it had been carried. It can hardly be supposed that, if it had been intended to introduce so great an alteration in the law, it would not have been introduced by express declaration. But to have introduced any such declaration would have occasioned, in many cases, great inconvenience and injustice. The only circumstance of which we are aware from which any colour can be given to the argument that the Act had the operation now suggested is the construction put upon it by this committee, in Smee v. Bryer (16) where it was held that the signature must be so affixed at the end of the will as to leave no blank space for any interpolation between the end of the will and the signature, and it might be said that such a security against fraud could not be afforded if a paper only referred to in the will could be admitted as part of it. But this construction was found to produce such extensive injustice that by the Wills Act Amendment Act, 1852, s. 1, the legislature interfered to alter the law so established, and this Act passed before the codicil in this case was executed.

I It was not contended in this case, nor, as far as we are aware, has it been contended in any case since the Act of 1837, that no reference, however distinct, is now sufficient to incorporate another testamentary paper in the paper duly executed as a will or codicil, but the question has always been what reference in the valid paper is sufficient to let in evidence to identify the invalid paper. Upon this point the important distinction has been introduced by the Act to which we have already alluded, viz., that whereas before the Act a paper not duly executed might be a codicil as to personal estate, and might, therefore, be referred to by that description, no such paper can now be properly so designated. That, with this exception, the law on this subject remains as it was before the statute, appears from an examination of the authorities, although in deciding on the question what is or is not a sufficient description to let in evidence, cases of great nicety are to be found. A

In April, 1841, the question now raised came before the Prerogative Court in In the Goods of Smith (17). In that case the testator, in May, 1838, made a codicil to his will, signed but not attested. In August, 1840, he made a further codicil, signed and duly attested. This was written on the second side of the paper on which the former codicil was written, and the deceased described it as "a second codicil to my last will and testament." SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST decreed probate of both codicils, observing: "The latter codicil being duly executed, referring to the former is an execution of the former codicil also." In In the Goods of Sotheron (18), the same learned judge recognised the rule as laid down in In the Goods of Smith (17) but held the reference in the will not to be sufficient to let in evidence of the paper propounded. In January, 1843, in In the Goods of Claringbull (19), SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST again acted on the rule laid down in In the Goods of Smith (17). B C

In the course of the same year he had to determine the important case of Countess De Zichy Ferraris and Croker v. Marquis of Hertford (20). The testator had there made a will and twenty-nine codicils. Some of the codicils were made before the Act of 1837, and required no attestation; others were made after the Act, some of them being attested and others not. One codicil, made at Milan in October, 1838, was unattested. He made a further codicil dated in April, 1839, duly executed and attested, and thereby declared "that he ratified and confirmed his will and codicils." The question was whether the Milan codicil was thereby established, and it was decided by SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST that it was not, and upon the principle that it was not a codicil, that it was not distinctly referred to as such, that there were other papers which were codicils and would satisfy the words of the instrument referring to them, and that the court could not, therefore, extend the words of reference to an instrument not answering the description. In June, 1844, the case on Lord Hertford's testamentary papers came before the Judicial Committee by way of appeal from the decision of SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST (Croker v. Marquis of Hertford (20)), and the decision was affirmed. DR. LUSHINGTON, in delivering the judgment of the committee, observed very strongly upon the inconvenience which might result from admitting papers to probate neither properly executed nor distinctly identified, but he also relied on the ground of the judgment in the court below, viz., that, there being no reference to the particular paper except under a general description of codicils, and there being instruments which properly answered the description of codicils, the words could not be extended to an instrument not properly answering the description. This was the case mainly relied on by the appellant in the argument before us. It is a decision on every ground entitled to the utmost respect, and we not only hold ourselves bound by its authority, but entirely assent to its principle. We can find, however, in it nothing inconsistent with the rule adopted in In the Goods of Smith (17) and In the Goods of Sotheron (18), which applied under the new Act the principles adopted under the old. D E F

The question came again before SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST in Ingoldby v. Ingoldby (21), in 1846. In that case the testator made an unattested codicil to his will, and afterwards made a second, properly attested, with the words, "this is another codicil to my will." On his death, these two codicils only were found, and SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST admitted them to probate. The learned judge observes (4 Notes of Cases, at p. 497): G H I

"I think the circumstances of this case are sufficient to distinguish it materially from the Marquis of Hertford's case (20). There is only one paper here which comes under the description of a codicil. It is not, indeed, a codicil, because it is not duly executed; but is clear that the testator intended it to be a codicil, not only from the paper itself, but from the endorsement; and it was attached

- A to the will by sealing-wax, without a seal. He describes the second paper as 'another codicil,' evidently referring to what he believes to be in existence. I apprehend there are cases in which a testator has bequeathed property to his children, and there being no legitimate children to answer the description, illegitimate have taken. So here, there being no duly executed codicil, the words may have reference to an unexecuted codicil."
- B The learned judge then adverts to the circumstance that there was a reference in the second codicil to a bequest contained in the first. He adverts to it as a not immaterial circumstance, but does not make it the ratio decidendi.
- C The same question again came before the court in 1849, in In the Goods of Phelps (22). There the testator made his will, duly executed, and afterwards made a first codicil on the same sheet of paper, attested by only one witness. He then executed a second codicil, duly attested, by which he referred to and confirmed the will, but took no notice of the first codicil. SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST held that the first codicil was not established by the second, for the instrument in question was not a codicil, and, therefore, the confirmation of the will did not amount to a confirmation of the codicil. In Haynes v. Hill (23), the point once more arose in August, 1849. In that case a testator made his will and several codicils, the last of which only was attested. The last codicil confirmed the will, but said nothing of the codicils. The question was in truth the same as had arisen in In the Goods of Phelps (22), and the same decision was pronounced. SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST went very fully into the doctrine, and held, as it seems on the most satisfactory grounds, that the case was governed by Marquis of Hertford's case (20), there being no reference to anything but the will, and the unattested codicils not being part of it. These cases, when compared with Gordon v. Lord Reay (7), clearly illustrate the distinction introduced by the Wills Act, 1837, to which we have already adverted. In In the Goods of Countess Dowager of Pembroke (24), SIR JOHN DOPSON, from whose decision the present appeal is brought, followed the decision of SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST in In the Goods of Sotheron (18), but his subsequent decision in the present case shows that he did not mean to infringe upon the rules to which we have referred.
- F The result of the authorities both before and since the Act of 1837, appears to be that when there is a reference in a duly executed testamentary instrument to another testamentary instrument by such terms as to make it capable of identification, it is necessarily a subject for parol evidence, and that when the parol evidence sufficiently proves that in the existing circumstances there is no doubt as to the instrument, it is no objection to it that, by possibility, circumstances might have existed in which the instrument referred to could not have been identified. As in this case the only question is whether there is sufficient evidence to identify the paper propounded as the will, it is not necessary to consider whether any evidence was received in this case, to which objection might be made.
- G The facts on which we rely are, beyond all question, admissible in evidence, viz., that the paper in question was written by the testatrix and was found locked up in her possession at her death in a sealed envelope on which there was an endorsement describing it as her will; that after diligent search no other paper has been found answering the description; and that the only trace of any other testamentary paper in the evidence, is the proof of an earlier will, which the testatrix destroyed.
- H Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion that the sentence complained of must be affirmed, and they think that the costs of all parties must come out of the estate.
- I Their Lordships cannot properly refer to the extra-judicial opinion of any individual, however eminent, as an authority for their decision, but it is satisfactory to them to observe that, in a work which, though it professes to be written only for the unlearned, may often be consulted by the most learned with advantage. LORD ST. LEONARDS treats as clear a point which, from its extreme importance, they have thought it advisable to examine at so great a length. In the HANDBOOK ON PROPERTY LAW (6th Edn.) p. 151, we find the following passage :

"So a will or codicil not duly executed may be rendered valid by a later codicil duly executed and referring clearly to it, or in such a manner as to show the intention. Therefore, if you were to begin your codicil, 'This is a codicil to my last will,' and there was only one will, those words would set up the will, although not duly executed."

The very learned author then points out the distinction where there are several wills and codicils, and refers to the decision in Marquis of Hertford's case (20), which he understands as we do.

Appeal dismissed.

BURRELL v. EARL OF EGREMONT

[ROLLS COURT (Lord Langdale, M.R.), December 8, 16, 18, 19, 1843, April 17, 1844].

[Reported 7 Beav. 205; 13 L.J.Ch. 309; 3 L.T.O.S. 72; 8 Jur. 587; 49 E.R. 1043]

Settled Land—Tenant for life—Incumbrance created by settlor—Payment off of charge by tenant for life—Right to have charge raised out of estate—Presumption against exoneration of estate.

If a tenant for life pays off a charge on the estates, in the same transaction merging the security by taking an assignment connecting it with the legal estate, that prima facie puts an end to the charge. A simple payment of the charge without more is sufficient to establish the right of the tenant for life to have the charge raised out of the estate. He has no obligation or duty to make a declaration or do any act demonstrating his intention. He may, if he thinks proper, exonerate the estate, but the presumption is that he pays the charge for his own benefit and not for the benefit of the persons entitled in remainder. This presumption, however, can be rebutted by evidence establishing a contrary intention on his part.

Limitation of Action—Charge—Recovery of money secured on charge on settled estates—Charge paid off by tenant for life—Right to charge as against remaindermen.

Where a tenant for life had paid off a charge of £25,000 on the settled estates and so was entitled to the charge for his own benefit,

Held: the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 40 [now s. 18 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939], did not apply to a case where there was no assignable person liable to pay a charge on settled estates, no person who by delay could be induced to suppose that the charge was abandoned or merged, and where the rent out of which the interest of the charge ought to be paid was receivable by and belonged to the same person as was entitled to the interest, and, although twenty years had elapsed before the death of the tenant for life without anything being paid on account of the charge or any acknowledgment being given, his representatives were entitled to the charge as against the remaindermen.

Action by the legal representatives of a tenant for life for a declaration that they were entitled to recover, as against remaindermen, the amount of charges upon the estate which had been paid off by the tenant for life.

By the marriage settlement of Charles Earl of Egremont, dated Feb. 26, 1750, A a term of 600 years was vested in trustees for the purpose of raising out of an estate in Yorkshire, by mortgage or sale, the sum of £25,000 for the portions of his younger children. By his will, dated July 31, 1761, Charles Earl of Egremont, appointed this £25,000 for the portions of his younger children as follows: £10,000 each to his daughters, Lady Elizabeth and Lady Frances, and £2,500 to his sons Percy Charles and Charles William. He gave directions as to the payment of B interest and the time of payment, and provided that if any younger son should become an eldest son, or if any younger son or daughter should die without issue, before the time of payment, his or her portion should sink into the inheritance charged therewith, and not be raised or paid. He then devised his estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall (subject in the first place to the raising and paying the annuities and sums of money then affecting the same, or thereafter charged C thereon by that his will, or any codicil he should thereafter think fit to add thereto), unto his eldest son George, and his assigns, for life, with various remainders over, under which the defendant, the present Earl of Egremont, had become entitled to the estates in possession. He then gave as follows:

"I give and bequeath to my daughters Elizabeth and Frances the sum of £10,000 a-piece, and to my sons Percy Charles and Charles William £2,500 D a-piece, which several portions I will shall be in augmentation of, and as an addition to, the portions already provided for them by my said marriage settlement, and hereinbefore appointed to be paid to them as aforesaid, and shall be raised and paid to my said sons and daughters respectively, at such times, and under such conditions, and subject to such contingencies, and with such interest, E as I have before directed and appointed their original portions to be raised and paid by this my will. And I do hereby subject and charge my manors, etc., and hereditaments in the several counties of Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall hereinbefore by me devised to my eldest son, with the raising and paying the said portions and sums of money to my said sons and daughters respectively, at the times and in the manner aforesaid."

After gifts of the mansion houses, and of an annuity of £300, and of certain personal F estate as heirlooms, the testator gave certain pecuniary legacies, which he directed to be exclusively paid out of certain particular parts of his personal estate. Then he gave all the residue of his personal estate, after payment of his debts and funeral expenses, and the legacies aforesaid, to his eldest son, George, and he added a proviso that if his personal estate should not extend to pay such of his G debts as should not be charged on his real estate, and his said funeral expenses and legacies, then he charged his estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, in aid and to make good any deficiency that might happen in his said personal estate.
For that end and purpose he empowered the trustees to raise by sale or mortgage of the estate and pay

"not only the sums of money and portions thereinbefore by him charged and H secured on the said premises, for his younger children, and such deficiency as should happen in his personal estate to pay his debts and legacies," but also such sums of money as should be necessary for the other purpose in his will mentioned.

Earl George attained the age of twenty-one in 1772 and became the sole legal representative of his father, Earl Charles and in May, 1773, he, out of his own I monies, paid the original and additional portions of his sister Lady Elizabeth, and on that occasion the real and personal estate of Earl Charles were released. In 1776 Earl George, out of his own monies, paid the original and additional portions of Lady Frances, and obtained a release, as heir of the body and executor of his father. In 1778 and 1781, he in like manner paid the original and additional portions of Percy Charles, and Charles William, who thereupon executed releases.
During his life Earl George did not indicate whether he intended the additional charges paid off by him to merge for the benefit of those entitled in remainder or

A not. Earl George died in 1837. By his will he, among other things, devised his hereditaments in the counties of Wilts, Somerset, Devon, Dorset, and Cornwall to the defendant Earl George Francis, and the heirs male of his body, and in default of such issue, unto the persons, and for such estates, as the estates in the same counties were, by the will of Charles Earl of Egremont, devised, after failure of the heirs male of his body. The bill in the present action was filed by the legal personal

B representatives of George Earl of Egremont, seeking to have the £25,000 bequeathed in addition by the will of Earl Charles to his younger children, which had been paid by George Earl of Egremont to his brothers and sisters, raised out of the real estates of which he had been tenant for life, and to which estates the present Earl had now become entitled. The defendant resisted this claim on three grounds. First, he said that the sum of £25,000 was a mere legacy, primarily charged on the

C personal estate of Charles Earl of Egremont, admitted by all parties to have been sufficient for its payment, and that as it was charged on the real estate as an auxiliary security only, and had been properly paid out of the personal estate, the residuary legatee had no right to a reimbursement. Secondly, that, even if it were primarily charged on the real estate, still George Earl of Egremont did not intend, when he paid it off, to keep it alive, but to have it released, and that it

D had been released accordingly. Thirdly, that, if the right claimed by the plaintiffs ever existed, it was now barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Pemberton Leigh, Turner, Lee and Piggott for the plaintiffs.

Kindersley, Tinney and Lloyd for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

E April 17, 1844. LORD LANGDALE, M.R.—This bill is filed by the legal personal representatives of the late George Earl of Egremont against the present earl, and it prays that an account may be taken of the principal money and interest alleged to be due to the plaintiffs in respect of a sum of £25,000 charged on certain estates in the counties of Somerset, Dorset and Cornwall, by the will of Charles

F Earl of Egremont, the father of the late Earl George and the grandfather of the defendant, and that the amount of what shall be found due may be raised by sale or mortgage of a sufficient part of the estates, and paid to the plaintiffs.

His LORDSHIP stated the facts, considered the terms of Earl Charles' will, and continued: Taking the whole of this will into consideration, I am of opinion, that the effect of it is to make the additional portions given to the younger children, a primary, if not an exclusive, charge upon the estates in Somerset, Dorset, and

G Cornwall, devised to the eldest son for life.

We have next to consider the effect of the several acts done by Earl George with reference to the payment of the several portions to his brothers and sisters. If a tenant for life pays off a charge on the inheritance, he is prima facie entitled to that charge for his own benefit, but he may, if he think proper, exonerate the

H estate. In the absence of evidence the presumption is that he pays the charge for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of the persons entitled in remainder, but evidence may show the contrary conclusion to be true.

The Lady Elizabeth Alicia Maria was married to Mr. Henry Herbert in the year 1771, and upon that occasion two instruments were executed, and an account stated. By one of the instruments it was recited that the Lady Elizabeth was, by virtue

I of the settlement executed before the marriage of the late Earl Charles, and by his will, entitled to two sums of £10,000 each, amounting together to £20,000 for her fortune or portion, and that the said two sums of £10,000 and £10,000 were charged upon and to be paid out of the real and personal estates of Earl Charles; and by the other of the instruments, after reciting the settlement and the will of Earl Charles, it was further recited, that upon the treaty for the intended marriage, it had been proposed, and agreed, that the several principal sums of £10,000 and £10,000 the original and additional portions of the Lady Elizabeth, so charged upon and payable out of the real and personal estates of Earl Charles, should be assigned as therein mentioned; and by the account then stated it appeared that the interest of one sum of £10,000 was paid by the guardians of Earl George, and that the interest of the other sum of £10,000 was paid by the countess, the executrix of the late Earl Charles. Earl George attained the age of twenty-one years on Dec. 18, 1772; and on May 11, 1773, he paid the sum of £20,000, pursuant to an arrangement made on the marriage of his sister the Lady Elizabeth to Mr. Herbert; and upon that occasion, a deed was executed by and between Mr. Herbert and the Lady Elizabeth of the first part, the Earls of Pembroke, Ashburnham, and Thomond, and Charles Herbert, of the second part, the Countess Dowager of Egremont and the Earl of Aylesford, of the third part, and George, Earl of Egremont, therein described as the eldest son and heir and executor of the will of his father Earl Charles, and also residuary legatee in the same will named, of the fourth part; and thereby, after reciting, among other things, that Earl George had attained the age of twenty-one years, and thereupon became entitled in possession to, and soon afterwards entered upon, the real estates limited and devised to him by the settlement and will of Earl Charles, and upon which, or upon part of which, the principal sum of £10,000, the original portion of the Lady Elizabeth, stood charged, and that the said Earl George, also, upon attaining the age of twenty-one years became entitled to the residuary personal estate of his father, which had been accounted for and satisfied to him by his guardians; and that he, having entered upon his real estates and possessed himself of his father's residuary personal estate, was desirous to pay off and discharge the several sums of £10,000 and £10,000, being the amount of the original and additional portions of his sister Lady Elizabeth, it was witnessed, that under the circumstances and for the reasons therein mentioned, the Earls of Pembroke, Ashburnham, and Thomond, and Charles Herbert, assigned the said two sums of £10,000 and £10,000 to Henry Herbert, and appointed Earl George, as executor, residuary legatee, and heir to his deceased father, and in every other right and capacity him thereunto requiring, to satisfy the same sums of £10,000 and £10,000 to the said Henry Herbert, and the same were accordingly paid; and the said Henry Herbert acknowledged the receipt thereof, in full satisfaction of the original and additional portions of the Lady Elizabeth, and of all claims and demands in respect thereof, upon the estates real and personal of Earl Charles, or upon the dowager countess, and the Earl of Thomond, or either of them; and Henry Herbert released them, and all and singular the estates real and personal of Earl Charles, from the same, and covenanted to do any other act required for further releasing the same and better extinguishing the same sums of money and all claims of Henry Herbert and Lady Elizabeth by reason thereof, or upon the estates of Earl Charles.

In the same month of May, 1773, and by deed, dated May 11, and made between Earl George, described as the eldest son and heir of Earl Charles, of the one part, and the dowager countess and the Earl of Thomond and John Drummond, of the other part, after reciting, among other things, that there was standing in the names of the Earl of Thomond and John Drummond, the capital yearly sum of £2,186 7s. 5d. consolidated long annuities which had been purchased out of the surplus produce of the real and personal estates of Earl George during his minority and were his absolute property in his own right, and that the portions of Lady Elizabeth had been paid, and that the Lady Frances, being in the eighteenth year of her age, and her portions being payable at her age of twenty-one years or day of her marriage, Earl George, in order to exonerate as well the residuary personal estate of his late father of and from the payment of the additional portion, legacy, or sum given to the Lady Frances by her father's will, and also the settled estates, and all other the estates real and personal of Earl Charles, of and from the original portion or like sum of £10,000 provided for Lady Frances by the settlement, and to secure and provide for the more immediate payment of the several portions or sums of money when and as the same should respectively become payable, had proposed and agreed that the yearly sum of £784 6s. 3d. Long Annuities, part of the yearly sum of £2,186 7s. 5d. Long Annuities before mentioned, should be appropriated and set

A apart to answer and pay the several portions of the Lady Frances, when the same should become payable; and after reciting that for the same purposes Earl George had proposed and agreed, that the yearly sum of £392 3s. 2d. Long Annuities should be appropriated and set apart to answer and pay the portions and additional portions, by the settlement and will of Earl Charles provided for his younger sons Percy Charles, and Charles William. It was, by the said deed, witnessed, that the same

B Long Annuities should be appropriated and set apart for the purposes of the recited arrangement. By another deed, also dated May 11, 1773, after reciting the matters aforesaid, Earl George allowed the accounts of his mother and guardians, and released his claims as residuary legatee. On July 9, 1776, the Lady Frances attained the age of twenty-one years. Soon afterwards, the Long Annuities set apart to answer her portions were transferred into her name, and thereupon, by

C deed poll dated August 29, 1776, she acknowledged that she accepted the same in full satisfaction of her portions under the settlement and will of her father, and she released Earl George, as well in his own right, as in his character of heir of the body and executor of his father.

Percy Charles attained the age of twenty-one years on Sept. 27, 1778, and Charles William attained that age on Oct. 8, 1780. At these times the Long Annuities

D provided to answer the portions were insufficient for the purpose, the sums required to make up the deficiencies were supplied by Earl George, and the younger sons, Percy Charles and Charles William, upon receiving the Long Annuities and the sums to make up the deficiencies, i.e., upon receiving their whole portions, executed releases dated, as to one of them, on Dec. 25, 1778, and as to the other of them, on Jan. 31, 1781.

E We cannot now know what Earl George might have said or done if he had been told that the charge of the additional portions exclusively or primarily affected the estates in Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, that he was under no obligation to pay the same out of his own money, and that, paying the same, he would be or was personally entitled to the benefit of the charge. Under the circumstances, it is possible, perhaps not improbable, that he might have desired and declared his intention to exonerate the estate, but, after a careful consideration of the deeds which were executed on the several occasions on which the portions of the younger children were provided for and paid, I am of opinion that the question was never brought to his attention. The original portions were known to be charged on the York estates, and were so treated, and there are expressions in the deeds which are to be explained with reference to them, and to the estates on which they were

G charged, but it seems to be clear that Earl George conceived himself, as executor and residuary legatee, bound to pay the additional portions out of his own money or the personal estate of which he was the residuary legatee. He was ignorant that the additional portions were properly and primarily chargeable on the real estates, of which he was tenant for life, and the nature of the charge being unknown, and unalluded to in the deeds, they contain no indication whatever of intention either

H to continue the charge or to exonerate the estate.

A tenant for life paying off a charge upon the estate, in the same transaction merging the security by taking an assignment connecting it with the legal estate of inheritance, prima facie puts an end to the charge, but something is required to manifest an intention to exonerate the inheritance. A simple payment of the charge without more is sufficient to establish the right of the tenant for life to have the

I charge raised out of the estate. He has no obligation or duty to make a declaration, or to do any act demonstrating his intention. The burden of proof is upon those who allege that, in paying off the charge, he intended to exonerate the estate. In the present case there is no evidence whatever except that which may be derived from the execution of the several deeds which have been stated, and as it does not appear from those deeds that Earl George knew his rights, it cannot be collected from them that he intended to waive, or in any way relinquish, his rights. The words of the deeds are fully satisfied, and are explicable only on the supposition that he did not know that he had any right to have the additional portions raised out of the devised real estate, and that he did understand it to be his obligation to pay them out of the personal estate or his own money. If it had been necessary to show, otherwise than by legal presumption, that Earl George intended to continue the charge, it would have been impossible to prove it, because it does not appear that he knew there was a primary charge, and the plaintiffs could not have proved that he intended to continue a charge, the existence of which, as a primary charge, was unknown. A

The difference between the situation of the plaintiffs and that of the defendant is that there is a presumption in favour of the plaintiffs and not in favour of the defendant. In the relation which subsisted between Earl George and the estate the law presumes that in paying off the sum charged he did not intend to exonerate the estate. It may be true, that if Earl George had known the nature of the charge and that he might have raised it for his own benefit, he might have thought fit to exonerate the estate, but this is no more than conjecture, and, in the absence of sufficient evidence, it cannot countervail a legal presumption, and I am under the necessity of concluding, that Earl George did not, by his acts, upon payment of the portions, exonerate the estates from the additional portions charged thereon by the will of Earl Charles, and that after the payment of the portions in 1781, Earl George was entitled to have the amount raised for his own benefit. B C D

With respect to the Statute of Limitations, it was argued for the defendant, that the right, if any, of Earl George to the charge on the land in respect of the portions, accrued, at the latest, on Jan. 31, 1781, when the last portion was paid. Releases having been given, it is said that the trustees could not have raised the portions at their own discretion upon the demand of Earl George; that if he had desired to avail himself of the charge, and have it raised for his own benefit, he must have filed a bill against the trustees and the remainderman; and that his right in this respect accrued sixty years before the present bill was filed. Earl George, it is said, if he had any right, was to be considered as in possession of an estate exonerated, with a right to re-impose the charge, and his right to re-impose the charge is lost by neglect, non-claim, and lapse of time under the statute. This argument, however, assumes, that the estate was exonerated, which is the point in question, but it is further said that there is no pretence that any rent was ever applied, or intended to be applied, in payment of interest, so that Earl George, if he ever was entitled to the charge, received no interest upon it; that he received the rents and applied them to his own use without any regard to the charges; and that his acts in that respect ought not to be qualified for the benefit of his executors. E F

The Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 40 [now Limitation Act, 1939, s. 18 (1)] enacts that no suit shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless, in the meantime, some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable or his agent, to the person entitled thereto or his agent. It is undoubted that the right of Earl George to receive the charge accrued to him in the year 1781, that no subsequent acknowledgment of his right thereto was ever made, and that more than twenty years after the right accrued expired in the lifetime of Earl George. But it is argued for the plaintiffs that the clause in the statute cannot be held to apply to cases which do not admit of the qualification referred to in the same clause, and that, under the circumstances of this case, Earl George ought to be deemed to have kept down the interest on this charge. G H I

The clause of the act assumes that there is not only a person capable of giving a discharge or release, but also an assignable person by whom the charge is presently payable, or who is capable of paying the principal or interest of the charge, or of making an acknowledgment of the right thereto, but, in this case, there was a charge upon the estate which no assignable person was then liable to pay, and in

A respect of which no person was capable of making an acknowledgment that it was due, as, during the life of Earl George, it was necessarily uncertain who, at the time of his death, would be the person to take in remainder subject to the charge. It is further argued that the statute can only apply to cases where one person is entitled to receive and give a discharge, and another person is entitled to pay or capable of giving an acknowledgment of the right to the charge; and that, if the

B statute were held to apply to a case like the present, it would apply to a case where the tenant for life had expressly declared his intention to keep the charge alive, or had procured a term to be vested in trustees for the purpose of keeping it alive, unless he had gone through the ceremony of paying money to the trustees for the purpose of receiving it back from them under the name of interest on the charge. On the whole, it appears to me that the statute cannot be applied to a case where there

C is no assignable person liable to pay the charge, no person who, by the delay, could be induced to suppose that the charge was abandoned or merged, and where the rent out of which the interest of the charge ought to be paid is receivable by and belongs to the same person as is entitled to the interest.

Before the charge was paid to the younger children, it was the duty of Earl George to pay or account for the interest to them, and to prevent any accumulation against the remainderman. After the portions were paid (supposing Earl George to have become entitled to the charge for his own benefit), it was still his duty to prevent accumulation of interest against the remainderman. Nothing is more common than for a man to have, with reference to the same property, a right to receive the income and a duty to apply the income or to make payments out of it in a certain manner. If the property producing the income be absolutely his, subject only to a charge in respect of which it is his duty to make payments of interest out of the income and he becomes owner of the charge, there is an end of the duty to make the payments, but the duty to make the payments may not be a simple duty owing to the person entitled to receive interest. Where the estate in the property charged is limited, as in the case of a tenant for life, the duty of paying interest to the person entitled to receive it, may be connected with the further

E duty of preventing the accumulation of interest against the remainderman, and where the owner of the rent has become owner of the charge, if the duty to prevent accumulation of interest upon the charge against the remainderman continues, this court will hold a tenant for life, owner of a charge on the inheritance, to have discharged that duty. It is presumed to be done, first, on the ordinary principle, that this court will assume to be done that which the party might and ought to have

G done; secondly, to prevent any prejudice arising to the remainderman by the accumulation of interest; and, thirdly, to prevent multiplicity of suits, and relieving the remainderman, compelled to pay an accumulation of interest, from the necessity of suing the representatives of the tenant for life, whose duty it was to pay the interest, for reimbursement.

It was contended that if the duty to pay comprised no duty to any one but the

H party entitled to receive, the court would not interfere or in any way qualify the acts of the tenant for life, for the purpose of deeming the duty to be satisfied or not. I agree to that; but in the case of a tenant for life, owner of a charge on the inheritance, it is not merely with reference to the party himself that the duty of paying the interest arises. He receives the income and is entitled to the interest payable thereout, and when he has received the income he is deemed to have

I paid or kept down the interest, not because of any duty which he owes to himself, but because he has a duty to another, i.e. to the remainderman, to prevent the accumulation of interest against him. If you suppose the charge to be a subsisting charge, there being no express payment of interest, no act by which the payment of interest can be proved, there would be an accumulation of interest against the remainderman if the law did not presume a duty to prevent it, and also a satisfaction or performance of that duty by the person who received the income by the due application of which the duty ought to have been performed. It is not, I think, necessary, to assume as a fact (though this has been done), that the tenant for life must have received the interest of the charge at the times when he received the rents of the estate. It is sufficient that by a rule of law the tenant for life of an estate who is also the owner of a charge on the inheritance must, in favour of the remainderman, be deemed to have kept down the interest of the charge out of the rents received, and I think that the remainderman in whose favour this rule has been established cannot be permitted to contend that the interest, thus for his benefit deemed to have been kept down and paid, was, in fact, not paid, for the purpose of enabling him to say, that, under the Statute of Limitations, the right to sue for the charge is lost. Under these circumstances, I think that the case does not come within the purview of the Statute of Limitations.

For the reasons I have stated, it appears to me that the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief which they pray. I declare, that, according to the true construction of the will of Earl Charles, the additional portions, amounting to £25,000 thereby given to the younger children therein named constitute a primary charge on the estates by the will devised to the testator's eldest son for his life, and that Earl George, the tenant for life of those estates, having paid the same additional portions to the persons entitled thereto, out of his own monies, became and was, and up to the time of his death continued to be, entitled to the same charge for his own benefit, and that the plaintiffs, as his legal personal representatives, are now entitled thereto, as part of his personal estate.

Order accordingly.

LORD KENSINGTON v. BOUVERIE AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Campbell, L.C., Lord Brougham, Lord Cranworth, Lord Wensleydale and Lord Chelmsford), July 1, 11, 12, 25, 1859]

6 Jur.N.S. 105; 11 E.R. 222]

Settled Land—Tenant for life—Charge on estate—Payment of interest by tenant for life—Insufficiency of rents and profits to meet interest—Intention not to create charge for deficiency—Mortgage of charge—Death of tenant for life—Right of mortgagees to charge for deficiency.

A tenant for life in possession of an estate subject to a charge received the rents and profits and paid the interest on the charge during his life, but he gave no notice that the rents were insufficient to pay the interest or that he intended the excess above such rents, which he paid out of other moneys of his own, to be a charge on the estate. After his death the mortgagees of the charge sought to charge the estate with the deficiency between the rents and interest.

Held by LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., LORD BROUGHAM, and LORD CHELMSFORD, LORD CRANWORTH and LORD WENSLEYDALE dissenting: the conduct of the tenant for life in paying the interest amounted to a declaration either that the rents and profits were sufficient to meet the interest or that he did not mean to create any charge on the estate for the deficiency; after his death his legal personal representatives could not be permitted to set up a claim for an alleged deficiency and demand an account of the rents and profits during the encumbency of the tenant for life; the mortgagees were in no better position; and, therefore, their claim failed.

Per LORD CAMPBELL, L.C.: The smallest demonstration by the tenant for life, by act as well as by words, that in paying off a charge he meant to discharge the estate is sufficient.

F Appeal from a decision of the lords justices (KNIGHT-BRUCE and TURNER, L.J.J.), reported 7 De G.M. & G. 134, reversing an order of SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R. (19 Beav. 39).

In 1832 the Kensington estate was mortgaged for £60,000 to the respondents, Lord Kensington covenanting to pay the said sum. In 1833, by the marriage settlement of Lord Kensington, the estate was conveyed, subject to the above charge, to him for life, with remainder to his son (the appellant), etc., in tail male, with a power to Lord Kensington to charge the estate to the extent of £20,000. By an indenture of Feb. 4, 1835, Lord Kensington, in exercise of that power, charged the estate with £20,000, and by deed dated Jan. 27, 1842, he mortgaged this charge to some of the respondents for debts amounting to £14,227 6s. 2d. Down to 1845

H Lord Kensington was in possession of the rents and profits of the estate, and from 1846 to his death in 1852 a receiver applied the rents in keeping down the interest due on the £60,000 and the residue towards paying the interest on the £20,000. All the interest due on the latter sum was paid and satisfied during Lord Kensington's life, but not entirely out of the residue, which was insufficient to pay it, but out of other moneys of Lord Kensington. Lord Kensington died in 1852, and his will contained no direction as to the charge of £20,000, or the interest that had accrued thereon. The appellant was entitled as tenant for life under the settlement of 1833, and wished to pay off £5,722 13s. 10d., the portion of the charge of £20,000 due to the respondents. He filed a bill in Chancery praying to be allowed to redeem the estate from the charge of £20,000 on payment of what should be due of principal and interest. The Master of the Rolls made a decree accordingly, and directed an inquiry to whom the amount of principal and interest was due. Afterwards it was declared that Lord Kensington was entitled to redeem on payment only of the principal of the charge of £20,000 and of the interest which accrued thereon since Lord Kensington's death in 1852. The lords justices, on appeal, reversed this order, and declared that he could not redeem except also on paying so much interest as accrued during Lord Kensington's life which the rents and profits were insufficient to pay. The appellant appealed to the House of Lords. A

July 25, 1859. The following opinions were read.

LORD CAMPBELL, L.C.—After an anxious consideration of this case, I adhere to the opinion I had formed upon it at the conclusion of the argument—that the decree of the Master of the Rolls ought to be affirmed. I do not proceed on the ground that if a tenant for life in possession of an estate subject to a charge bearing interest pays the interest although the rents and profits are insufficient to enable him to do so, he may not make himself an encumbrancer for the excess of his payments beyond the amount of the rents and profits. But it seems to me that if, remaining in possession, he receives the rents and profits and regularly pays the interest upon the charge during his lifetime, having given no intimation that the rents and profits were not sufficient to enable him to do so, or that he means to consider any excess of his payments beyond the rents and profits a charge upon the inheritance, his legal personal representatives cannot be permitted to say that such a charge exists. The controversy in this case is substantially between the present Lord Kensington and the legal personal representatives of his father. If the charge cannot be claimed by them, I think I can easily show that the mortgagees are in no better situation. C D E

We may begin by considering how it would have been if the late Lord Kensington had created the charge, and without mortgaging it, had continued in possession till his death, without any intimation that the rents and profits were not equal to the interest on the charge. Upon his death could his representatives have claimed that he had a charge upon the estate for an alleged excess of the amount of the interest beyond the amount of the rents and profits, and upon a bill filed by the remainderman to redeem the charge have insisted on an account of the rents and profits of the estate from the creation of the charge to the death of the tenant for life, for the purpose of showing whether there was any and what deficiency? I apprehend that under such circumstances they would have been told that there was a presumption that the rents and profits were equal to the interest on the charge, and that they could not be let in to rebut this presumption. Lord Kensington having mortgaged the charge, I think his position became the same as it would have been if he had become tenant for life, the charge having been previously created in favour of third persons. F G

I rather wonder that any question has been made as to his power to create the charge for the £20,000 and interest, or as to such charge having actually been created. I cannot doubt that the corpus of the estate was effectually charged with the £20,000 and interest, and that all that we have to consider is the third question made by TURNER, L.J.: "whether, the estate being so charged, the charge is subsisting so far as the rents and profits have been insufficient to answer the interest?" Whether a court of equity ought or ought not to hold that this charge is still subsisting, I think we must consider that in point of fact the interest upon the £20,000 was regularly paid by Lord Kensington. Let us then consider the general question, if a tenant for life of an estate subject to a charge, he being bound, so far as the rents and profits furnish him with the means, to keep down the interest upon it, remains in possession and during his life regularly pays the interest without any intimation that the rents and profits are insufficient, or that he has any intention of charging the corpus of the estate with any deficiency, can his legal personal representatives be permitted to set up a claim for an alleged deficiency, and to demand an account of the rents and profits during the whole encumbrance? H I

A of the tenant for life? If the tenant for life had entirely paid off the charge, most undoubtedly, as far as the principal sum is concerned, he would have a charge on the corpus of the estate, because the annual rents and profits could not be considered as supplying a fund from which the principal could be paid. But with regard to the interest, the annual rents and profits in the vast majority of cases do, and in all may be presumed to, supply a fund from which the interest may be paid.

B With regard to the principal, it cannot be reasonably supposed that the tenant for life means to make such a present to the remainderman, and the claim of a charge to the amount of the principal may be made effectual without any account being taken, whereas with respect to any deficiency in the means to pay the interest, the tenant for life may reasonably be supposed to waive any right he might have to make it a charge upon the estate, he being allowed to remain in undisturbed possession, and in the comfortable expectation that when he is dead and gone, no inquiry will take place into his management of the property, nor any attempt be made to charge his representatives with wilful neglect which might be imputed to him. It is said that this is a question of intention, and that there should be some evidence of intention. But LORD THURLOW said :

D "The smallest demonstration is enough to show that the tenant for life means to take the debt upon himself."

E Surely this demonstration may be by acts as well as by words, and a continued system of a tenant for life paying the interest upon a charge which he is bound to keep down so far as the rents and profits will permit may amount to a declaration (which he cannot afterwards gainsay) that the rents and profits are sufficient, or that he does not mean to bring any charge upon the inheritance for the deficiency.

F The most alarming inconveniences would arise from the doctrine that in every case where a tenant for life of an estate under a charge, the interest of which he ought to keep down from the rents and profits, pays the interest regularly during his lifetime, he is to be considered as silently making himself an encumbrancer on the estate for any excess, large or small, of the payments for interest above the rents and profits. In the first place an account must be taken extending over the whole encumbrancy of the tenant for life, which may be above seventy years, and the inquiry must be not only as to the rents and profits which he did actually receive, but as to such as by reasonably good management he might have received, the whole management of an estate, consisting perhaps of many thousands of acres, must be inquired into, and the result may be that there is a balance of 6s. 8d. in favour of the representatives of the tenant for life. The Master of the Rolls perhaps went too far in saying that such an account could hardly be taken, but he might have said truly that the cost of taking such an account would generally greatly exceed the benefit to be expected from it. Then see the injustice done to the remainderman. It being important to him to know whether the interest is kept down by the tenant for life, he may be supposed to inquire into the fact. If he finds that the interest has not been kept down, he may well suppose that the rents and profits have been misapplied by the tenant for life, and he may apply for the appointment of a receiver. Finding that the interest is regularly paid as it becomes due, he gives himself no further thought, but upon the death of the tenant for life he hears with surprise and dismay that a charge upon the inheritance is claimed by the representatives of the tenant for life, and he is to be involved in a Chancery suit, which may last for years, to ascertain the amount of the encumbrance. A further hardship to the remainderman would be, that he would be deprived of the benefit of the Statute of Limitations, passed in contemplation of the death of witnesses and the destruction of written documents.

I A still more serious evil would arise from the uncertainty as to this new-fashioned circumstance created by a comparison between the amount of the interest paid and the amount of the rents and profits which might have been realised during the encumbrancy of the tenant for life. Upon a sale of the remainder, the abstract must not only show what encumbrances there are upon it, and that the interest upon the encumbrances has been kept down, but also that the rents and profits have been sufficient to keep down the interest, so that the representatives of the tenant for life will have no claim upon the inheritance to interest which he has paid, beyond the amount of the rents and profits. The charge is constantly shifting from year to year, and the actual amount of the burden cannot be ascertained till the death of the tenant for life. But if the rule I have proposed be adopted, I am not aware of any inconvenience or any injustice which it can occasion. In the absence of any authority that such a claim can be sustained I must come to the conclusion that where there are no circumstances to counteract the effect of the interest being regularly paid by the tenant for life in possession, the claim is unsustainable. Great reliance has been placed in the present case upon the fact that the tenant for life was under a personal covenant with the mortgagees to pay them this interest. But how can the question between the representatives of the tenant for life and the remainderman be affected by a covenant between the tenant for life and the mortgagees? And if the interest has actually been paid without the reservation of any claim against the corpus of the estate, why should the covenant prevent the estate from having the benefit of the payment? The tenant for life voluntarily entered into that covenant after the charge had been created.

Reliance is next placed upon a supposed expression of intention by the late Lord Kensington to make the interest he had paid a charge upon the inheritance because by his will he disposes of the £20,000 "and interest." But supposing that any intention expressed by him in a document not meant to be read nor to operate till after his death could be availing for this purpose, the words of this bequest are fully satisfied by the interest that would become due on the £20,000 after the remainderman has entered and before the charge is redeemed. It was likewise argued that Lord Kensington's manifest desire to increase his personal estate ought to lead to the conclusion that he paid the interest for the benefit of his younger children, not of his eldest son. But if we are to guess at his intentions on this point when he executed the settlement containing the power of charging, my belief is that he never contemplated that under the power the estate should be charged with more than £20,000 during his own life, he remaining in possession and paying the interest, and with interest after his death till the charge should be redeemed. If he had been asked what his intentions were in covenanting with the mortgagees to pay the interest and paying it from funds other than the rents and profits, he would probably have said: "I mean that at my death I may have the £20,000 bearing interest to be divided among my younger children, and that subject to this charge and the charges previously created, my eldest son shall take the Kensington estate."

It now only remains to be considered whether the mortgagees in resisting the redemption of the charge can be in a better situation than "representatives of the tenant for life." In the first place it is argued on behalf of the appellant that the re-claim is clearly barred by the following proviso in the deed of Jan. 27, 1842:

"Provided always and it is hereby agreed and declared between and by the parties to these presents, and the true intent and meaning of the parties further is, that until default shall be made in payment of the said principal sums, or the interest thereof, or any part thereof at the time mentioned for payment thereof in the said covenant for payment by the said William Lord Kensington, and the true intent and meaning of these presents is, that it shall and may be lawful to and for the said William Lord Kensington, his heirs and assigns, peaceably and quietly to have, hold and enjoy the said premises hereby charged as aforesaid, and the said hereditaments and premises hereby granted, released and conveyed, with their appurtenances, and receive and take the rents, issues and profits thereof, and the interest of the said sum of £20,000 expressed and intended to be hereby assigned as aforesaid, to and for his and their own use, without any let, suit, trouble, interruption or disturbance whatsoever of, from,

A or by the said Edward Bouverie, Richard Lord Bishop of Oxford and Phillip Pleydell Bouverie, their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, or any or either of them, or of, from, or by any other person or persons whomsoever lawfully or equitably claiming or to claim by, from, or under, or in trust for them or any of them."

B Default never was made in payment of the interest stipulated for according to the true intent and meaning of the indenture. Therefore, Lord Kensington alone had a right to the interest of the £20,000 assigned as a security to the mortgagees. Besides, the interest of the £20,000 appears substantially to have been paid to the mortgagees, although the payment was nominally made under the covenant, and as they have actually once had the benefit of the security, it would not be equitable that they should again claim it as an unsatisfied charge upon the inheritance.

C There seems to be even less colour for the claim of the mortgagees than for the claim of the representatives of the tenant for life, for, although the interest had been paid to the mortgagees by the tenant for life, he possibly might have continued to make it a charge upon the inheritance as between him and the remainderman. But if the interest which became due in the lifetime of the tenant for life has been paid to the mortgagees, they have so far realised their security, and as to them the estate is relieved from liability. But, at all events, the mortgagees cannot be entitled to more than the mortgagor was entitled to, and if the interest had ceased to be a charge upon the inheritance in the lifetime of the tenant for life by payment of interest to the mortgagees, the mortgagees, who claim under him, cannot support this charge against the remainderman. For these reasons I am of opinion that the decree of the lords justices ought to be reversed.

E LORD BROUGHAM.—I have come to the same conclusion as my noble and learned friend, and, generally speaking, for the reasons which he has given. It will be unnecessary for me to go into this case beyond what my noble and learned friend has done. There is one exception that I have to make, as to the difficulty, delay and expense of taking an account. My noble and learned friend seemed to think that the Master of the Rolls had stated it to be almost impossible. In the former part of his judgment he leans to that view, but in the latter part of it he does not say that it is impossible, but he talks of the difficulty, expense, and delay of taking such an account, which he says would be enormous, and he does not see how it could be done except as against a mortgagee in possession. Upon the whole, the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, coinciding with the view which has been taken by my noble and learned friend, appear to me quite satisfactory, and I, therefore, agree that the decree of the Master of the Rolls ought not to have been reversed by the lords justices.

G LORD CRANWORTH.—In this case I have the misfortune to differ from my noble and learned friends who have preceded me.

H I need not go into the facts of the case—they are familiar to your Lordships—and I merely remark that, under the settlement of the present lord in the lifetime of his father, his father having the power of charging the estates with £20,000 (and I concur with my noble and learned friends that it is clear upon the construction of the settlement that that meant £20,000 and interest), that power was exercised by a deed executed by the late lord on Feb. 4, 1835, whereby he charged the estate with

I £20,000, and created a term in a trustee of the name of Whittaker to secure that sum. Afterwards we learn by the recitals in the deed under which the respondents claim that there had been previous charges by the late lord in favour of the original mortgagees, Lord Braybrooke and others, for the sum of £14,227 6s. 2d., part of this £20,000, and then in consideration of a large sum of £17,600 due from Lord Kensington to Bouverie and others upon other mortgages of other property and the sum of £6,900 advanced by them to the late lord, he covenanted to pay the whole of those two sums amounting to £24,500, and he assigned to them his charge of £20,000, subject to the prior assignment which he had made to secure £14,227 6s. 2d.

That was the state of the rights of these parties and their liabilities to one another. A
 From the time of the execution of this deed Lord Kensington regularly paid interest on the whole of the debt due from him to Lord Braybrooke and others, which included the £14,227 6s. 2d., and I will assume that he did so (I do not think that it quite clearly appears, but I will assume that he did so) also on the £24,500 due from the respondents.

Lord Kensington died in August, 1852. Then, his son William, having become B Lord Kensington, filed a bill against Bouverie and others to redeem the Kensington mortgage on payment to them of the sum of £5,772 13s. 10d., with interest, from the death of his father, that being the balance of the £20,000, after deducting the £14,227 6s. 2d. due to Lord Braybrooke and others, the first mortgagees. The question is: On what terms he is entitled to redeem. The respondents contend C that the sum due for the settled estate on account of the £20,000 is the principal sum of £20,000, with interest from the date of the charge (Feb. 4, 1835), deducting only from the interest the amount of the rents received by the late lord, or accrued due in his lifetime subsequently to Feb. 4, 1835. The present Lord Kensington contends that no interest can be claimed during the lifetime of his father, as it was all paid by him to the mortgagees from time to time as it became due. D Lord Braybrooke and others, the first mortgagees of the £20,000, were made co-defendants, but they do not wish to be redeemed, nor do they raise any question in the suit. They are, I understand, satisfied with their security. The Master of the Rolls, by whom the cause was heard, took the same view of the case as the appellant, and directed an account of what was due for principal, interest and costs in respect of the £20,000, and an account, on the other hand, of what was due from the respondents, who had taken possession as mortgagees on the death of the late E lord, in respect of rents received by them, or which, without their wilful default, they might have received. The chief clerk took this account, calculating interest on the £20,000 only from Aug. 10, 1852, the day of the death of the late lord, and the Master of the Rolls, when the matter was brought before him, upheld the chief clerk's certificate. There was an appeal to the lords justices, who took a different view of the case. They held that all the interest on the charge for F £20,000 which had accrued due in the lifetime of the late lord, subsequently to the date of the charge, was still due, except so far as he had received rents sufficient to liquidate it, and they varied the decree on that principle.

It is between these conflicting views of the case that we are now called on to decide. It is clear that Bouverie and the others were entitled by virtue of their security to a charge for interest as well as principal, and the only question is whether G the interest has been so paid as to discharge the estate from the burden. I will assume that interest was duly paid on the whole mortgage debt of £24,500, for which the £20,000 subject to the prior claim on it was made a security. But the argument of the respondents was that whatever interest was paid by the late lord was paid by him, not in his character of mortgagor, not as tenant for life of the mortgaged estate, but by reason of his covenant to pay his own debt of £24,500 and interest, H which imposed on him a personal obligation to pay the interest as it became due; that he, if he were alive, or his executors now that he is dead, would, but for the mortgage, have had a right against the corpus of the estate for all interest on the £20,000 when the rents had failed to satisfy; and that the mortgagees have now the same rights which he or his representatives would have had if there had been I no mortgage.

To arrive at a just conclusion on this subject we must look to principle, and proceed in our reasoning by steps. First, it is clear that any person entitled to an equitable charge, and filing a bill to have that charge raised, has a right against the corpus of the property charged for interest no less than for principal, supposing, of course, that it is a charge bearing interest. His right to the whole principal and interest, unless barred by the Statute of Limitations, is available after any number of successive life-estates. This cannot be disputed. Suppose the charge to be a charge in the name of a third person as trustee for a tenant for life, on the death

A of the tenant for life his executor might file a bill to have the charge raised, and prima facie the sum to be raised would include interest as well as principal. It would, however, be a good answer to the demand for interest that as tenant for life he had, since the creation of the charge, been in receipt of the rents which were the primary fund to discharge it, and if, on taking the account, it should appear that rents had been received sufficient to cover the interest, no further claim could be
B made on that head. It was, I am aware, contended that a tenant for life cannot under any circumstances become an encumbrancer on the remainder for interest accrued due during his tenancy. But for this proposition I can discover no foundation either in principle or authority. Suppose the security to be one which during the tenancy for life produces no profit; suppose, for instance, that it is a mere reversion, or that it is a mine unproductive, or that prior mortgagees are in possession
C exhausting the whole annual income, I can see no reason why, when the reversion falls into possession, or the mine becomes productive, or the prior mortgagees, being satisfied, withdraw, the representative of the tenant for life should not have precisely the same rights against the corpus which certainly a stranger would have had.

If this is so, then it cannot make any difference in principle that the security had
D by any of the means I have suggested become productive during the life of the tenant for life. In such a case, indeed, his representatives seeking to raise the charge must against their demand for interest give credit for what he had received on account of rents and profits, but in other respects their rights under their security will remain unchanged. These considerations lead, I think, necessarily to the conclusion that in every case of a tenant for life or his representatives
E raising a charge out of the corpus of the estate charged, the question as to how far he or they may add the interest or principal depends on how far the interest has been satisfied by means of rents and profits. Under the head of "rents and profits" I include the benefit of personal occupation or enjoyment in any mode authorised by the deed or will creating the tenancy for life, in respect of which the tenant for life must be charged with an occupation rent in the usual manner. If this is the
F right of the tenant for life or his representatives, it follows that persons claiming under him as mortgagees (which is the position of the respondents Bouverie and others in this case) must have the same right—that is, that the assignee of the charge may raise out of the corpus so much of the interest due on the security as has not been covered by rents and profits received by the tenant for life. It will hardly be disputed that this is a necessary consequence of the rights of the tenant
G for life, if the interest has not been paid to the mortgagee who is seeking to make the charge available.

The question is: What are the rights of the mortgagee of the charge if the tenant for life has during his life regularly kept down the interest? I do not think that such payment can of itself and alone make any difference in the rights of the tenant for life, or by consequence in the rights of mortgagees claiming under him, at all
H events where, as in this case, the tenant for life has come under personal obligations, binding him to pay the interest. Suppose that he had come under such an obligation by a simple borrowing without assigning his charge by way of security—by bond or covenant for instance—payment of interest would in that case have had no effect on his rights on the settled estate by virtue of the charge. How is the case altered by the circumstance that for security of the lenders he has assigned to them
I all his rights under the charge? What the rights are must remain the same, whether they continue vested in the tenant for life or his representatives, or have been assigned to others. The only ground on which payment of interest can affect the right of his representatives against the corpus must be, that it manifests an intention to discharge the estate from the burden of the interest. But this would not, I think, be a just inference, unless there is something beyond the mere fact of payment. I can hardly think that, even where a tenant for life under no personal obligation keeps down the interest, that alone indicates an intention to exonerate the estate in favour of the remainderman. But, if such intention might under those circumstances fairly be assumed, surely the inference cannot be extended to the case where the payment is made by a person bound to pay, whatever may be his wishes or intentions. If he is under no personal obligation it may be argued—I do not say whether successfully or not—that by voluntarily paying what he was not bound to pay he showed an intention to benefit someone, and that the person intended to be benefited must have been the owner of the corpus. But I cannot understand how any inference of intention as to the nature of a particular payment can be drawn from the mere fact of payment, when the payment itself was one which could not be avoided. In such a case, if any inference arises, it must be from the fact that the tenant for life enters into a covenant binding himself to pay principal and interest. After he has once entered into the covenant he is no longer a free agent; he is bound to pay the interest whatever may be his intentions towards those who are afterwards to enjoy the inheritance.

It was argued that the doctrine contended for by the respondents, and affirmed by the decree of the lords justices, might operate hardly on a remainderman, for that, where the interest is regularly paid, he must naturally suppose that the tenant for life has received rents sufficient to enable him to make the payment, and so will abstain from taking proceedings to secure due payment of the interest by obtaining a receiver. I do not feel much force in this argument. What the remainderman is interested in is to take care that the interest is not allowed to fall into arrear, for if it be allowed to fall into arrear, then, whatever rents may have been received by the tenant for life, however sufficient may have been their amount, the remainderman may become liable to satisfy the arrears. To prevent that injustice, he may in a proper case obtain a receiver at the expense of the estate. But if the interest is regularly paid, the inheritance can never be burdened with it except so far as it has been paid in excess over the rents and profits, and if there be such excess—that is, if the rents and profits were not sufficient to keep down the interest—the appointment of a receiver would have been of no avail; he could only have taken care that the rents were duly applied so far as they would extend; and if the tenant for life, or his representatives, seek to charge the inheritance with any excess of payment in respect of interest, due credit must be given in taking the account for all which the tenant for life received in respect of his tenancy for life.

If he regularly paid the full interest for any considerable number of years, that might be fairly contended as amounting to prima facie evidence that the rents received were equal to the interest so as to cast on the tenant for life or his representatives the burden of proving that there was a deficiency. Be that however as it may, the argument amounts to no more than this, that, in order to do justice, it may be necessary to take accounts of considerable length and complexity. I cannot feel that this raises any substantial difficulty. In the present case there are no circumstances that I can discover to qualify or explain the payment of interest which the late lord under his covenant was bound to make, and I find nothing to exclude the right of his mortgagees to insist on having all the interest of the £20,000 raised in the same manner as Lord Kensington or his executors might have done if he had not mortgaged the charge, except so far as the interest has been satisfied by rents received by the late lord.

Several authorities were referred to in argument, but none of them appeared to me to support the proposition of the appellants. Great stress was laid on Jones v. Morgan (1). There William Morgan, who, under his father's will, succeeded to the devised estates during his minority, came of age in March, 1746, and in the following month of April he took up a bond of his father held by Lock for £1,876, which was a charge on the settled estates. He gave a fresh bond for the same sum. William, the devisee, paid interest on this new bond until 1761, when he paid it off, and in 1763 he died. In 1776, thirty years after the father's bond had been paid off, William's administratrix filed her bill seeking to charge the inheritance with the amount of the bond and interest. But LORD THURLOW held that the circumstances manifested an intention on the part of William to discharge the estate even if he had been only tenant for life. It was unnecessary to decide any such point.

A inasmuch as it was held that William was tenant in tail. But the circumstances there were very different from those in the present case. William need not have made himself personally responsible for the bond, and, therefore, in doing so, and afterwards paying it off, he might be considered as showing that he did not intend to retain any charge on the inheritance. In the case now under consideration, the late Lord Kensington did not discharge any previously existing debt. He exercised B a power of burdening the inheritance, and in order to obtain the benefit conferred on him by the power he was obliged to enter into a covenant binding himself personally to pay the interest on the sums advanced to him, for security of which he assigned (inter alia) the benefit of the charge. I cannot see how either the entering into such a covenant, without which he could not have obtained the loan of the money, or the subsequent payment of interest, which he could not avoid paying, C can be taken to indicate any intention whatever as to the inheritance. They were acts showing the intention of Lord Kensington to secure to himself the benefit of the £20,000, but showing nothing more.

In Tracy v. Hereford (2), what was decided first by SIR LLOYD KENYON and afterwards by LORD THURLOW was that a tenant for life is bound, as between himself and the inheritance, to keep down the interest of an encumbrance accruing during D every part of his tenancy for life, though during the first part of that tenancy the rents may have been insufficient for the purpose—that is, that the excess of rents received by him in the latter part of his life are applicable to make good any prior deficiency in relief of the inheritance. This case seems to me rather to support than to impugn the doctrine contended for by the respondents. I do not go through the other cases which have been cited. None of them appears to me to be at E variance with what, but for the high authority of those who differ from me in this case, I should have considered to be the well-established doctrine of the Court of Chancery, namely, that where the tenant for life keeps down the interest of a charge on the inheritance, he becomes himself an encumbrancer on the inheritance for the amount of what he pays so far as the payments exceed the rents and profits accruing during the tenancy for life, and that this right is not varied by the circumstance that he either originally was, or during his tenancy for life becomes, himself F entitled to the charge. It is hardly necessary to add that circumstances may show, either as regards the principal or interest, that the tenant for life intended to exonerate the estate. But I do not think that the mere fact that he has regularly paid the interest is sufficient to raise such a presumption—certainly not where, as in this case, all which was paid was paid under the personal obligation of a covenant G to pay. The consequence is, that I think the decree of the lords justices was right, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—The question in this case is on what terms the appellant is entitled to redeem a charge of £5,722 13s. 10d., part of a sum of £20,000 charged on his Lordship's estate, by virtue of a power contained in his father's H marriage-settlement of Oct. 10, 1833. His father died on Aug. 10, 1852. The appellant contends that he is entitled to redeem on payment of that sum and interest thereon from the time of the death of his father. The respondents insist that they must be paid the principal sum and interest which accrued in the lifetime of the late Lord Kensington, so far as the rents were sufficient to satisfy that after paying the interest of a prior mortgage. The Master of the Rolls took the former I view; the lords justices the latter.

I have had an opportunity of being acquainted with the opinion of some of my noble and learned friends who heard the case and have kindly communicated their reasons to me, and, therefore, have had more than usual means of fully considering it with every light that can be thrown upon it. I am of opinion with my noble and learned friend who last addressed your Lordships, that the decree of the lords justices ought to be affirmed. This question depends, as TURNER, L.J., truly says, on three points: first, whether the late lord had the power, as between himself and the parties entitled in remainder under the settlement, to charge the estate with the interest on the £20,000 to accrue during his life; secondly, whether he has in fact so charged it; and, thirdly, whether the charge is subsisting so far as the rents have been insufficient to satisfy the interest. Upon the two first points there appears to be no doubt. The only question is on the third. The charge of the £20,000 and interest was made pursuant to the power in the marriage-settlement on Feb. 4, 1835, subject to the mortgage for £60,000 to Lord Braybrooke and others, and soon after the charge was mortgaged to different persons for different sums, amounting altogether to the sum of £14,277 6s. 2d., and then the £20,000 and interest, subject to those prior charges, leaving a balance of £5,722 13s. 10d., was assigned to Messrs. Bouverie, the respondents, on Jan. 27, 1842, together with a great number of mortgages on different properties of Lord Kensington paid off by them, to the amount of £17,600, and in consideration of these sums, and of a further advance of £6,900, making altogether £24,500, Lord Kensington covenanted to pay that sum to the Bouveries, the respondents. All the mortgaged property, including the charge of £20,000 and interest, is made a security for the £24,500 and interest covenanted to be paid by the late lord.

It was supposed in the court below that there was proof of payment of the rents and profits of the estate charged to Messrs. Bouverie and the other mortgagees for their share of interest, and of the remainder of that interest, out of the general moneys of Lord Kensington. I have not been able to find any proof of such payment of interest in the printed documents laid before us. The affidavit of Mr. Tatham states, that from 1846 Messrs. Tennant and Harrison, either out of the rents of the estate or out of money received by them for Lord Kensington, regularly paid the interest on the £60,000 and £14,277 6s. 2d., part of the charge of £20,000, and he believes that interest in respect of the residue of the said sum of £20,000, viz., £5,722 13s. 10d., was duly paid out of moneys belonging to Lord Kensington, and that at the time of Lord Kensington's death there was no arrear of interest. This is not sufficient proof of payment, and I do not find any other. But certainly there is none that the interest of the £20,000 charged on the estate was ever paid on that account specifically. It may be that the interest on the sums advanced on mortgage and covenanted to be paid, and particularly the interest of £24,500, which was covenanted by the late Lord Kensington to be paid to the respondents, Messrs. Bouverie, was paid according to this covenant. For that amount he was personally responsible, and he probably discharged himself from his personal responsibility. All the interest upon the £24,500 may, therefore, be presumed to have been paid, and though at first sight it would appear that the interest upon the £5,722 13s. 10d., part of the £20,000, and forming part of the security for the £24,500, was, therefore, paid, I think that it does not follow.

I was much struck with the argument of counsel for the respondents that the payment of interest on the £24,500 did not involve payment of the interest charged on the estate of the £5,722 13s. 10d., part of the £20,000. I think their argument is correct. The charge on the estate of £20,000 and interest from the date of the charge (in effect a charge of £20,000 and an additional charge of £1,000 per annum till paid) is (subject to the prior charges, leaving a balance of £5,722 13s. 10d.) with many other securities made a security for £24,500 and interest covenanted to be paid—not the principal of the £20,000 (subject as aforesaid) for the principal, and interest for the interest, but principal and interest together for the whole debt. After the receipt of interest by the mortgagees on the principal sums due to them by covenant and by Messrs. Bouverie in particular on the £24,500 covenanted to be paid to them, there was nothing to prevent any of the mortgagees applying their share of the interest charged on the estate, which was a security for their whole debt, respectively to pay off a part of their principal debts with it. It might happen to become necessary to do so, in order to pay that principal in full. The receipt of the interest of the debt itself, therefore, by no means affects the rights of the mortgagees to pay a portion of the principal money of these debts by means of this charge of interest on the land, and, therefore, does not amount of itself to the payment of interest, part of the charge, and is not equivalent to a specific

A payment of that interest. If the interest had been paid and received specifically on account of the interest of the charge, the land would have been pro tanto exonerated and the charge to the extent of that interest satisfied, but not if the interest was paid on the whole debt of £24,500 in discharge of the covenantors' personal liability, any more than if a bond had been given to secure the debt and the interest on that bond paid.

B I think, therefore, that, in effect, no part of the interest of the £5,722 13s. 10d., part of the £20,000 charge, has been paid, and, not having been paid, the whole remains due, less the rents and profits, and Messrs. Bouverie have a right to demand all the share of the debt mortgaged to them—viz., £5,722 13s. 10d. and interest, which the rents and profits of the estate were insufficient to satisfy. If the interest has not been paid, no question arises as to the intent with which Lord Kensington paid the balance, and whether it was a charge on the inheritance or not. Though this argument was pressed in the court below, the court did not give effect to it, but decided upon a different ground. They assumed that the interest had been paid in the charge itself, and in exoneration of the estate; and the Master of the Rolls held that Messrs. Bouverie were not entitled to have the interest paid prior to the death of Lord Kensington. The lords justices held that they were, so far as the rents and profits were sufficient. On the assumption that the interest on the charges has been regularly paid by the rents and profits and by the moneys of Lord Kensington, I agree with LORD CRANWORTH that the decree of the lords justices is right.

E It is agreed that, if a tenant for life pay off the principal of a charge, he must be taken prima facie to mean to continue the charge for his own benefit. But it is said that there is a difference between the payment of the principal and the payment of interest. I must own I cannot see the distinction. The tenant for life is not bound to pay the interest upon any charge beyond the amount of the rents and profits: the difference is a charge upon the corpus of the estate, and if the tenant for life pays off that charge, I do not see why the presumption should not equally apply to the discharge of that part of the encumbrance which the tenant for life is not bound to pay as well as to the discharge of that part of the encumbrance which consists of principal, and which he is not bound to pay; and if in the one case no notice is necessary to be given to the remainderman of an intention to keep alive the security in order to make it effective, I do not see why any notice should be necessary in the other. The reasoning of TURNER, L.J., is, to my mind, perfectly satisfactory on that point.

G If I rightly understand the argument of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, he considers this case as substantially between the present Lord Kensington and the legal personal representatives of his father, and that, if this charge could not be lawfully claimed by them, the mortgagees could not be in a better position; and he thinks that the representatives would be told that there was a presumption that the rents and profits were equal to the interest, and they would not be let in to rebut that presumption. It is the latter part of this proposition only that appears to me, with deference, incorrect. I am not aware that there is generally such a presumption. It must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. Where a property has been recently mortgaged there may be such a presumption for persons do not commonly lend except when the rents considerably exceed the interest of the money advanced; but when an estate is charged to the extent that this is, I cannot agree with my noble and learned friend that a presumption exists. I On the contrary, the appellant, if claiming under the marriage settlement by which the Kensington estate appears to have been charged with the interest of the mortgage for £60,000 an annuity of £156 and the interest of the charge of £20,000, must be taken to have known the extent of all the encumbrances, and, of course, he would have known the annual value of the estate which is stated in the schedule to that deed to have been about £2,914, and he would not be presumed to have believed that the rents and profits would be sufficient to pay the interest. He must have known to the contrary from the first, and must have understood that the interest was paid (if it really was paid, on which I have already said enough) in a great measure from the private funds of the tenant for life. There has been no concealment from him by the tenant for life, no deceit, actual or constructive, by him, no disregard of any known duty, and I cannot see how the appellant's position as remainderman has in any way been altered by the conduct of the tenant for life. A

Upon the whole, then, it seems to me, on the assumption that the charge of interest has been paid off, that this is the ordinary case of a tenant for life paying off a charge on the corpus of the estate, which, as between him and the remainderman, he was not bound to pay. And I concur with my noble and learned friend (LORD CRANWORTH) that the judgment of the lords justices was right. B

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The whole question in this case is whether the appellant is entitled to redeem a charge of £20,000 upon his estate on payment of the principal and the interest which has become due since the death of the late Lord Kensington his father or whether he is bound in addition to pay certain arrears of interest which accrued during the life of the late lord, and which were unpaid at his death. The power under which the charge was created, and the terms of the deed by which it was raised have been fully stated, and I may, therefore, put the question in a more general form. Where a tenant for life in possession has power to creat a charge in his own favour, and he exercises the power and afterwards mortgages the charge, if the rents and profits of the estate are insufficient to keep down the interest of the charge, and the tenant for life regularly pays from year to year all the interest which becomes due upon the mortgage, do the arrears of interest upon the charge beyond what the rents and profits will satisfy become at once a charge upon the estate to which either the representative of the tenant for life is entitled, or of which the mortgagee of the charge can claim the benefit in satisfaction of the principal of his mortgage? C D E

There is no doubt that if a tenant for life pays off a charge upon the estate without more, he is presumed to have meant to leave the charge upon the estate, and he becomes a creditor for the sum which he so pays. A simple payment of the charge is sufficient to establish his right to have the charge raised out of the estate. He has no obligation or duty to make a declaration to that effect, or to do any act demonstrating such an intention, but, of course, any declaration by him, or, as LORD THURLOW says in Jones v. Morgan (1), F

“the smallest demonstration that he meant to pay off the charge will prevent his representative coming for the money.”

A different presumption, however, may not unreasonably be considered to arise where the tenant for life pays the interest upon a charge beyond what the rents and profits will satisfy. It is his duty to keep down the interest to the extent to which the rents and profits will enable him to do so, and the remainderman is only interested in ascertaining that this duty is performed. If it is neglected the remainderman may file his bill to make the rents answerable—but if the interest is regularly paid he need not concern himself further. I do not go the length of saying that it ought to be presumed in such a case that the rents and profits are sufficient to enable the tenant for life fully to keep down the interest, but I do think that it is the duty of the tenant for life, if he intends that the surplus interest shall be a charge upon the estate, to make some declaration, or to do some act demonstrating this intention. This appears to have been the opinion of LORD THURLOW, for he says in Jones v. Morgan (1): G H I

“He paid interest much beyond what the profits of the estate would have discharged, which is a demonstration prima facie that, though tenant for life, he meant to discharge the estate.”

It may, perhaps, be too much to assert that the mere payment of interest beyond the profits will be sufficient to raise the presumption of an intention to exonerate the estate, as it would thus arise immediately upon such over payment. But as it appears that even in the case of paying off an encumbrance any demonstration

A that it was not to continue to be a charge on the estate will be sufficient to exonerate it, where a tenant for life goes on year after year applying the rents and profits as far as they will go in keeping down interest upon a charge, and paying the deficiency out of his own funds without any notice or claim, may it not reasonably be presumed from his conduct that he means what he has done in exoneration of the estate, more especially where the estate is in settlement, and the person
B entitled in remainder is his own son? If a different rule were to prevail, very inconvenient and serious consequences might result to the remainderman. For thirty or forty years payments might be going on which he might reasonably suppose were only in performance of the duty of the tenant for life, and at the end of that long period a heavy accumulated charge might suddenly be thrown upon the estate. If he is ignorant of the insufficiency of the rents and profits to keep
C down the interest, he may fairly assume from the silence of the tenant for life that they are sufficient for the purpose. If he knows that the rents and profits are not sufficient, he may well believe that it is the intention of the tenant for life to exonerate the estate. So in dealing with the reversion, great embarrassment and difficulty might arise from holding that a charge was created by the mere payment of interest beyond the profits, as inquiry would in all such cases be necessary, not
D only whether the interest had been paid, but also how it had been paid, that is, whether out of the rents and profits, or by the funds of the tenant for life. And as, according to the opinion of TURNER, L.J., upon the authority of Burrell v. Earl of Egremont (3), the Statute of Limitations would not apply to this case, the state of things suggested in argument may be conceived to arise, that for ten years or more the tenant for life might have gone on paying interest beyond the amount of the rents and profits, and afterwards for twenty years they may have been sufficient to meet the interest, and then at the death of the tenant for life his representative would have a right to claim the excess of interest on the ground of a charge
E silently imposed so many years before.

It appears to me that the argument was a good deal embarrassed by considering the payments made to the mortgagees as being made with reference to the rents and profits, and so entitling the mortgagees to stand in the place of the representative of the tenant for life. The correct view of the case is that the receipt of the rents and profits by the tenant for life was virtually a receipt for so much interest upon the charge of £20,000. The payment of interest upon the mortgages under the personal obligation of the tenant for life was a matter wholly distinct and collateral. The rents and profits were not specifically applied to the payment of the F interest on the mortgages, and, therefore, the assertion which was made during the argument that no part of the interest on the charge of £20,000 had been paid because the rents and profits had been applied as far as they would go to the interest due to the mortgagees was a misapprehension and only tended to confusion. The tenant for life is bound to keep down the interest of the charge to the extent of the rents and profits. He is bound by his personal covenant to pay the interest upon
G the mortgage, not out of the rents and profits specifically, but out of his own funds generally. He pays the interest on the charge of £20,000 pro tanto, by his receipt of the rents. He pays the interest of the mortgage in full out of his own funds. The mortgagees cannot complain, for they have received their full interest; nor, as long as the interest is paid, have they anything to do with the receipt or the application of the rents and profits. This is expressly provided for by their mortgage-
H deed in the clause read by my noble friend on the Woolsack. They can have no case unless they can establish that the rents and profits being unequal to the payment of the interest on the charge of £20,000, so much as was thus deficient must be regarded as unsatisfied interest, and as continuing to be a portion of their security for payment of the principal of their mortgage. But even as between them and the tenant for life or his representative, as long as their interest was paid, the tenant for life might deal with the interest of the £20,000 as he pleased. He might have expressly discharged the estate by acknowledging the receipt of the whole interest upon the charge, or by an express declaration that he would exonerate the estate from it. He might have acted so as to make his conduct amount to a demonstration that this was his intention. A

It appears to me that the circumstances of the case are sufficient evidence that he meant to exonerate the estate. How, then, came his representative after his death to repudiate this intention, or the mortgagees to insist upon a charge which they could not have compelled the tenant for life to create in their favour, and which by his acts he had disclaimed? The mortgagees can have no right at all, unless it can be derived through the existence of a charge in favour of the tenant for life, for the interest which the rents were unequal to pay. I think they have entirely failed to prove that such a charge exists, and that the appellant is entitled to redeem the encumbrance of £20,000, on payment of the principal and interest which has accrued since the death of the late Lord Kensington. The decree of the lords justices must, therefore, be reversed, and that of the Master of the Rolls affirmed. B C

Appeal allowed.

ROBINSON v. WOOD

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Kindersley, V.-C.), July 1, 1858]

Will—Gift over—Avoidance—Defeasance of vested estate on happening of event—Divesting of original devise.

A testator devised lands in fee, but declared, in effect, that, if the devisee died under twenty-one years of age and without issue, the lands should go over. The ultimate devise after the gift over was to a charity, and void under the Charitable Uses Act, 1735 [repealed by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888]. The devisee died under age and without issue. F

Held: the rule in Lassence v. Tierney (ante p. 47) did not apply and the original devise in fee was divested. G

Notes. The law of mortmain, which imposed restrictions on assurances of land for charitable purposes, was repealed by the Charities Act, 1960, s. 38 (40 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 168). However, this case is reported as it illustrates a wider principle, namely, that when there is a gift over purporting to divest a prior estate in fee simple and the devise over fails, it must be taken that it was the intention of the testator to divest the estate which was given in the first instance. B Action in which the plaintiff, as heir-at-law of Ann Dales Allison, claimed the estate of the testator, John Dales Allison, under his will, and the defendants, the trustees of the testator, claimed that, on the death of Ann Dales Allison, the estate was undisposed of by his will.

C The testator, John Dales Allison, by his will, dated Sept. 3, 1840, gave and devised certain lands to trustees, upon trust, after the decease of John Dales, to sell a part for payment of debts and a legacy, and subject thereto upon trust that they, his trustees and trustee for the time being of his will, should receive and take the rents, income and profits of all the remaining part of his freehold and other real estates as the same should arise and become due and payable, and upon receipt thereof pay and apply the same for the maintenance, education and bringing up of the testator's daughter Ann Dales Allison, until she should attain the age of twenty-one years, and when and as his daughter should attain the age of twenty-one years, upon further trust to convey, assign, transfer and assure the residuary freehold and other real estates and property (subject as aforesaid) unto and to the use of his daughter, her heirs and assigns for ever, and he gave, devised and bequeathed the same unto his daughter, her heirs and assigns accordingly.

E He further provided that in case his daughter should die under the age of twenty-one years leaving lawful issue her surviving, then his trustees and trustee for the time being of his will should stand and be seised and possessed of his residuary, freehold and other real estates and property, upon trust for the absolute use and benefit of such issue, his, her or their heirs and assigns as tenants in common, if more than one; but in case his daughter should die under the age of twenty-one years without leaving lawful issue her surviving, then upon trust that his trustees and trustee for the time being of his will should receive and take the rents, income and profits of his residuary, freehold and other real estates and property as and when the same should arise and become due and payable, and upon receipt thereof pay and equally divide the same unto and between the testator's wife, if she should at that time remain his widow and unmarried, and Mary Allison, or their respective assigns, share and share alike, during their joint natural lives, and his wife remaining his widow and unmarried during such time; but if his wife should at that time be dead or married again, or should at any time afterwards die or marry again, leaving Mary Allison her surviving, then should pay the whole of such rents, income and profits unto Mary Allison or her assigns during her natural life. In case Mary Allison should at that time be dead, or should at any time afterwards die leaving his wife unmarried her surviving, then should pay the whole of such rents, income and profits unto his wife or her assigns during her natural life, if she should so long remain his widow and unmarried.

H And from and after the decease of his wife and Mary Allison, and of the survivor of them, or the decease of Mary Allison and second marriage of his wife, upon trust that they, the said John Wood and Stephen Hill, or the survivor of them, or the heirs of such survivor, should, as soon as conveniently might be thereafter, sell and absolutely dispose of the residuary freehold and other real estates and property, and the fee-simple and inheritance thereof, either by public auction or private contract, and either together or in lots, as should be thought fit, and make and execute all such contracts, conveyances and assurances, as should be necessary for carrying such sales into effect. And the testator declared that the money arising from such sales of such property, after deducting all incidental costs, charges and expenses, should be paid to the treasurer of the Primitive Methodist Society, to be applied by him for the general use and benefit of the said Primitive Methodist Society, according to the direction of the general annual conference of such society.

I

The testator died in 1840, and John Dales the tenant for life died in 1840. The testator's wife and Mary Allison died in the lifetime of Ann Dales Allison, who died in 1856 under the age of twenty-one years and unmarried. The testator was illegitimate and had no issue. It was not disputed that the devise over to the Primitive Methodist Society was void under the Mortmain Act. The trustees thereupon claimed the estate as undisposed of. The plaintiff, as heir-at-law of Ann Dales Allison filed his bill claiming the estate.

Baily and Hobhouse for the plaintiff.

Swanston and Kay for the defendants.

KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—This case raises two questions, one of which is upon the construction of a will and is a pure question of common law without a single ingredient of equity in the case, except that the devise is to trustees, and, therefore, the interests are equitable. But whatever construction a court of law would put upon the will would be put by a court of equity.

The question is, first, whether there is by the prior part of the will an estate in fee simple given to the testator's daughter? So far as it is necessary, I am of opinion (though I think I should like a little more time for consideration before deciding) that it is a vested interest in fee-simple in the daughter in the first instance, liable of course to be divested. But the decision in this case does not turn upon that point. I do not expressly decide it, but it is merely my first impression which I may alter. It is sufficient to say that I assume in favour of the plaintiff that the daughter did take the estate in fee-simple in the first instance.

The only other question is whether that estate is divested by virtue of the subsequent clause? The gift is in the first instance to trustees. I have already said that I will assume in favour of the plaintiff, that that gave an estate in fee-simple to the daughter. Then came two clauses, both of them providing for divesting; one in the event of her leaving issue, the other in the event of not leaving issue; and the question is whether that latter clause divests the estate. Of course, if this is a gift to a charity, it is void, and by the terms of the Charitable Uses Act, 1735, the whole gift is void. The statute directs that no lands shall be given in trust or for the benefit of any charitable uses whatever, except in a particular manner; and then comes s. 3, that all gifts of any lands, tenements or hereditaments to or in trust for any charitable uses whatsoever, which shall be made otherwise than in that particular manner, shall be absolutely and to all intents and purposes null and void.

It might be well argued that the effect of this is to make the whole gift over void, and that there is nothing to divest the estate in this gift over, and I confess I should feel it very difficult to get over that reasoning. But if I find that the precise question has been brought before the Court of Common Pleas and the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and that the Court of Exchequer Chamber has come to the conclusion that in such a case, if the devise fails for any reason, the intent is that still the devise over operates to carry the estate over, it would not be for me in the exercise of my functions, whatever opinion I may entertain, to overturn that decision. It appears to me that not only is every particular as to a charity precisely the same as in this case; but the reasons in Doe d. Blomfield v. Eyre (1), are entirely adverse to the claim of the plaintiff; and I must assume that that principle is not merely to be taken as the expression of that particular judge, but as the expression of the opinion of the whole Court of Exchequer Chamber. The effect of that decision is that, when there is a gift over purporting to divest a prior estate in fee-simple and the devise over fails, it must be taken that it was the intention of the testator to divest the estate which was given in the first instance. And I must come to the conclusion that, if the case now before me were to be decided by the same learned judges, they would come to a similar decision.

Then, how can I take upon myself to say that the decision is wrong? If I found several decisions the other way, of course I could weigh one against the other. But what are the cases upon the subject which are suggested as adverse to this

A decision? First of all I will refer to a case of a testator giving a share of property to his children as an absolute gift, and then directing that that share shall be settled; but these do not bear upon the present case—they do not turn upon whether the divesting was upon a contingency. The testator says: “I wish my daughter to have the absolute interest but modified, seeing that if she has children her children shall have it, but leaving it to her if she has no children”; it is not defeating or divesting an absolute gift, but making a modification. It is a desire to let in the children quite consistent with the original design. Those cases do not bear upon the question, and the only other case cited is Jackson v. Noble (2). I confess that Jackson v. Noble (2) is very difficult to reconcile with Doe d. Blomfield v. Eyre (1); and when we look to Jackson v. Noble (2), the ground of the decision was that the contingency had never happened at all, and of course a decision founded upon that ground does not touch the question at all. The court decided that the contingency had never happened. At all events the decision is not adverse to Doe d. Blomfield v. Eyre (1), and whatever opinion I may have, without any special authority directly adverse, I cannot say that the decision in Jackson v. Noble (2) is directly adverse. Whatever opinion I may have, that case being so decided, I feel myself bound to come to the same conclusion as that court to which, if I were not precluded by law, I should have sent a case under the old practice. But having regard to the nature of the question, I think that in dismissing the bill it ought to be without costs.

RANGER v. GREAT WESTERN RAIL. CO.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Cranworth, L.C., and Lord Brougham), May 31, June 3, 6, 7, 9, 10, 13, 14, 16, 17, 1854]

[Reported 5 H.L.Cas. 72; 24 L.T.O.S. 22; 18 Jur. 795;

G Building Contract—Payment—Certificates of principal engineer of building owner—Impartiality—Principal engineer shareholder in owner company—Duty of principal engineer in calculating sums due—Right to deduct sums as liquidated damages for delay in doing work—Failure by contractor to proceed to satisfaction of building owner—Forfeiture of tools and materials—Remedy for wrongful forfeiture—Action for damages—Right to account of value of things taken.

H By contracts under seal dated in 1836 the appellant, a contractor, undertook to do certain work for the respondents, a railway company, to the approval of the principal engineer of the company. The company agreed to advance to the appellant during the progress of the work sums of money from time to time certified by the principal engineer, and it was further agreed that during the progress of the works the decision of the principal engineer with respect to the amount, state, and condition of the works executed and as to every other matter or thing relating thereto should be final and not subject to appeal. The principal engineer was a shareholder in the company. There was a clause in each contract providing that if the appellant should delay in completing the work or not proceed to the satisfaction of the company, after notice given to him by the company all the tools and materials on the ground for the purpose of the work would become the property of the company. As the appellant did not proceed with the works to the satisfaction of the company they gave him the requisite notice and later took possession of the tools and materials.

Held: (i) the whole tenor of the contracts showed that it was never intended that the principal engineer should be an impartial arbitrator, but that, in coming to his decisions, he would act as an agent of the company, and, therefore, the fact that he was a shareholder in the company did not render him incapable, as being an interested party, of validly discharging the duties imposed on him by the contracts; (ii) the principal engineer performed his duty under the contracts if, in calculating the sums due to the appellant he acted bona fide and with the intention of proceeding according to the exigency of the terms of the contracts, and it was not necessary to institute any minute enquiry as to how far his calculations were accurate; (iii) in paying the amounts from time to time certified as due to the appellant the company were entitled to deduct sums specified in the contracts as liquidated damages to be payable by the appellant in respect of delays in completing certain parts of the work; (iv) even if the company had wrongfully taken possession of the works, the appellant was not entitled to treat the contract as abandoned, his remedy being an action for damages; on taking possession the company did not become absolute owners of the tools and materials, and must account for their value in settling their accounts with the appellant.

Appeal by the plaintiff in the action against a decree of the Vice-Chancellor of England, in a suit instituted by a railway contractor in which he alleged fraud and asked for an account. The respondents (defendants in the action) denied liability.

B The appellant was a railway contractor, who was employed by the respondents in the years 1836, 1837, and 1838 to execute some extensive and important works, forming portions of the line of their railway. The respondents, when they set about making their line from Bristol to London, divided the whole distance into two portions, that beginning at Bristol and proceeding eastward to Reading was described as the Bristol or B line; that from Reading to London as the London or L line. The respondents were incorporated by an Act of Parliament passed in the year 1835, and in the following year the appellant entered into three different contracts with them for forming three several portions of the line of railway. The first contract bore date Mar. 19, 1836, and was a contract for forming the line along about two miles and three quarters, beginning at or near the Bristol docks, and running eastward, to a particular field in the parish of Keynsham. The second contract was dated May 9, 1836, and was for a distance of somewhat more than two miles, beginning at Keynsham, at the point where the other contract terminated, and running eastward. These two contracts were designated respectively as the 1 B contract and the 2 B contract. The third contract bore date Aug. 30, 1836, and was for a portion of the line beginning at the Caversham Road, near Reading, and running eastward for nearly six miles. This was called the 8 L contract. Besides the works thus designated, the appellant also executed some works to the westward of the 1 B contract, which were described as the 1 B extension works. The appellant, after the date of each of these three contracts, proceeded in the execution of the works to which they related, and received large sums of money on account, but on July 2, 1838, the respondents took possession of all the works comprised in the 1 B and 2 B contracts, including the 1 B extension, and seized all the plant, tools, and materials thereon belonging to the appellant, alleging that he had made default in duly proceeding according to his engagements, and that they had, by express stipulations contained in the contracts, a right to seize the whole as forfeited.

G The appellant, on July 21, 1838, filed his bill against the respondents and others, praying, among other things, that the respondents might be restrained by injunction from proceeding to complete the works of which they had so taken possession. The bill was afterwards amended several times, and the object of it, as so amended, was, in effect, to show that the appellant must be considered to have been fraudulently led into signing the contracts, that, at all events, the respondents had, by their conduct in taking possession of the works, put an end to the contracts, and that he was entitled to be paid for what he had done, irrespective of the stipulations contained in them, as on a quantum meruit. The prayer in the bill, as it was ultimately amended, did not ask for an injunction. The respondents, during the progress of the works not only paid the appellant large sums of money on account, but also advanced to him sums to the amount of £28,000 on mortgage of the plant and materials employed. The bill alleged that at the time of these mortgages the respondents were indebted to the appellant on account of the works he had executed, and it, therefore, insisted on the right to charge the respondents with interest on the sums so due. The prayer of the bill as ultimately amended was in substance for a general account of what was due to the appellant at fair prices for the works he had executed, disregarding the contracts, and charging the respondents with interest on all sums due to him at the dates of the mortgages, and also charging them with the value of the plant and materials of which they had taken possession. On Nov. 21, 1839, the respondents put in their answer, denying all the allegations of fraud, insisting on the contracts, and justifying their conduct in seizing the plant, tools, and materials, as being warranted by the express terms of the contracts.

Very soon after the filing of the original bill, namely, on Aug. 10, 1838, the respondents seized and took possession of the appellant's stock and plant employed in the third or 8 L contract, claiming to be entitled so to do under its provisions by reason of the neglect and misconduct of the appellant. They then proceeded to finish the whole of the works themselves, and prevented the appellant from any further interference. On Mar. 5, 1840, the appellant filed a bill of revivor and supplement, stating the seizure of the plant and materials on the line comprised in the 8 L contract, and praying in substance relief as to the works comprised in that contract, similar to that which he had in the first bill asked as to the other contracts. The respondents answered this bill on June 9, 1840. On Sept. 15, 1841, the appellant filed another supplemental bill, alleging that since the filing of the former bills he had discovered errors in the accounts on which payments had been made to him, inasmuch as certain work he had done under the three contracts had been treated as common or coarse rubble masonry, whereas it was in fact Ashlar masonry for which he was entitled to a much higher rate of payment than he had in fact received, and the bill prayed that in taking the accounts asked by the former bills, this error might be rectified. The respondents answered the last bill on Mar. 4, 1842. Issue being joined, witnesses were examined on both sides, and a great deal of documentary evidence was put in, consisting chiefly of very numerous letters and notes which had passed between the appellant or his agents and the engineers and servants of the company during the progress of the works. The causes were heard by SIR LANCELOT SHADWELL, V.-C., who, on July 13, 1844, made the decree now appealed from.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Q.C., Roundell Palmer, Q.C., and Twells for the appellant.
Sir Richard Bethell, Q.C., and Stevens for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

May 26, 1854. The following opinions were read.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., stated the facts and continued: Before I proceed to call your Lordships' attention to the grounds on which the appellant rests his title to relief, and to consider how far that title is well founded, it is necessary shortly to advert to the terms of the contracts. They are all nearly alike, and I will for the present confine myself to the first or 1 B contract. It is a deed under seal, made between the railway company, of the one part, and the appellant, of the other part. It recites that a specification and plan of the 1 B portion of the line had been prepared by Mr. Brunel, the principal engineer of the company, that the appellant had agreed to execute the works therein described according to the same, that a copy of the specification with the appellant's tender to execute the works was annexed to the contract, that copies of the same had been signed by the appellant and Mr. Brunel, and were intended to be deposited in the office in Bristol, and that the company had agreed to advance to the appellant during the progress of the works sums of money by way of instalments according to the work from time to time done and certified by Mr. Brunel, and at their completion to pay him what should remain due. It was also stated that the appellant had agreed to secure the due performance of his contract by a bond for £4,000 with two securities, conditioned, among other things, for payment to the company, for every week's delay in the completion of various enumerated portions of the work, certain stipulated sums, increasing as the delay increased. It is then witnessed that the appellant covenanted with the company to execute the works according to the specification, and that they should be commenced within ten days after notice by the engineer to commence, and should be completed within the time mentioned in the specification. There are then various engagements on the part of the appellant to conduct the works as the engineer should approve, the details of which it is not important to consider.

There is then a clause stipulating that, if the appellant should become insolvent or should, from any cause not arising from the act of the company be delayed in

A completing the works, or should not proceed in the works to the satisfaction of the company, it should be lawful for the company to give notice in writing to the appellant, either under their common seal or under the hands of two directors, requiring him to proceed regularly with the works, and if after such notice he should for seven days make default in regularly proceeding, it should be lawful for the company to employ other workmen to complete the works and to pay for the same out of the money then due to the appellant, that the payments then already made to him should be taken by him in full satisfaction of all his claims for work then done, that all the balance of moneys which would have become due to him, and all the tools and materials then on the ground for the purpose of the works, should become the absolute property of the company, and that, if such balance and materials so to become the property of the company should be sufficient to cover the charges of the company, then the appellant should make good the deficiency. There is then after some other stipulations a proviso that all the works referred to in the specification as extra works, which the engineer should require to be executed, should be deemed to be included in the covenants entered into by the appellant, and should be paid for as thereafter mentioned. Further, it was stated that if the company should think fit to make any alteration in or additions to the works D (including the extra works), they might do so upon giving to the appellant written instruction for the purpose, signed by the engineer, and that the same should be paid for according to the schedule of prices signed by the appellant. There follows an agreement that in case of any dispute between the appellant and the resident engineer, the appellant would abide by the decision of the principal engineer, and if the appellant should be in any way delayed in the completion of the work by the act of the company, the principal engineer should determine whether any, and if any, what extension of time ought to be allowed.

The deed contains a covenant by the company to pay the appellant the sum of £68,028 16s., for the completion of the works (exclusive of extra works), in manner following, that is to say, at the end of fourteen days from the commencement of the works four-fifths of the value of the works then executed, to be estimated by F the principal engineer or his assistant resident engineer, having reference as well to the schedule of prices annexed to the tender as to the entire cost of the whole works, the execution of such works to be certified by the principal engineer, and so at the end of every fourteen days until the one-fifth retained should amount to £4,000, and thenceforth would pay the whole amount certified every fortnight, and at the end of the work would pay the whole £4,000 retained as aforesaid, that G is to say, £2,000 at the end of one month, and £2,000 at the end of a year from the final completion. It was further agreed that the company would pay for the extra work in the same manner, according to the schedule of prices, provided, nevertheless, that the appellant should not be entitled to receive any of the said payments until the works, in respect of which they were to be made, should have been certified by the principal engineer. It is lastly agreed that during the progress H of the works the decision of the principal engineer with respect to the amount, state, and condition of the works actually executed, and as to every other matter or thing relating thereto should be final, and without appeal, but if any difference should arise between the company or their engineer and the appellant after the completion of the contract as to any matter of charge or account between the company and appellant, then the same should be settled by arbitration in the manner I there pointed out. These are, I believe, the material parts of the contract or deed itself, which, together with the specification containing in great detail a description of the works to be executed, is set out in the bill, and at the end of it is a copy of the tender which had been made by the appellant to do the works, together with the schedule of prices. The deed was executed as well by the company as the appellant.

The first ground on which the appellant rests his title to relief is that he was induced to enter into the contract I B by the fraud of the company; that the sum at which he agreed to do the works was far below what he would have required if he had known the real nature of the soil through which the tunnels were to be made, but that on this point he had been misled by the fraudulent contrivance of the respondents. [His LORDSHIP referred to the contentions of the appellant and the evidence, and concluded:] On these grounds I have come, without hesitation, to the conclusion that the appellant has failed to establish any title to relief on this head of fraud. A

The next ground on which he rests his title to relief is that Mr. Brunel, the principal engineer of the company, on whose decision many matters were, by the terms of the contract, made to depend, was incapacitated from acting in the discharge of the duties imposed on him, by reason of his being himself a shareholder in the company. [His LORDSHIP stated the terms of the contract relating to the duties and powers of the principal engineer.] It is not necessary to state the duties of the engineer more in detail. He was, in truth, made the absolute judge during the progress of the works of the mode in which the appellant was discharging his duties. He was to decide how much of the contract price of £63,028 from time to time had become payable, and how much was due for extra work, and from his decision there was no appeal except that, after all should have been completed, the appellant might call in a referee of his own as to any question of the amount, if any, then due beyond what had been certified. The complaint made by the appellant is that the duties thus confided to the principal engineer were of a judicial nature; that Mr. Brunel was the principal engineer by whom these duties were to be performed, and that he was himself a shareholder in the company; that he was thus made a judge or arbitrator in what was, in effect, his own cause; and that, until the month of July, 1838, the appellant was unaware of the fact of Mr. Brunel having any interest in the company, except as their engineer, and so ought not to be bound by any of his decisions. B C D E

This branch of the appellant's argument rests on the principle discussed in this House in Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal Proprietors (1), in which your Lordships agreed, or apparently agreed, with the able opinion delivered by the learned judges through PARKE, B., that the decision of a judge made in a cause in which he has an interest is voidable, unless in a case of necessity as where an action was brought against all the judges of the Common Pleas, in a matter on which they had exclusive jurisdiction. I say "agreed, or apparently agreed," for the point did not in the result actually call for the decision of the House. I shall, however, assume that to be (as I believe it is) the law. F

But the question is whether it governs the present case. I think the principle has no application here. A judge ought to be, and is supposed to be, indifferent between the parties; he has, or is supposed to have, no bias inducing him to lean to the one side rather than the other. In ordinary cases it is a just ground of exception to a judge that he is not indifferent, and the fact that he is himself a party, or interested as a party, affords the strongest proof that he cannot be indifferent. But here the whole tenor of the contract shows it was never intended that the engineer should be indifferent between the parties. When it is stipulated that certain questions shall be decided by the engineer appointed by the company, this is in fact a stipulation that they shall be decided by the company. It is obvious that there never was any intention of leaving to third persons the decision of questions arising during the progress of the works. The company reserved the decision for itself, acting however, as from the nature of things it must act, by an agent, and that agent was for this purpose the engineer. His decisions were, in fact, their decisions. The contract did not hold out or pretend to hold out to the appellant that he was to look to the engineer in any other character than as the impersonation of the company. In fact, the contract treats his acts and their acts for many purposes as equivalent, or rather identical. G H I

I am, therefore, of opinion that the principle on which the doctrines as to a judge rest wholly fails in its application to this case. The company's engineer was not intended to be an impartial judge, but the organ of one of the contracting parties. The company stipulated that their engineer for the time being, whosoever he might

A be, should be the person to decide disputes pending the progress of the works, and the appellant, by assenting to that stipulation, put it out of his power to object on the ground of what has been called the unindifferency of the person by whose decision he agreed to be bound. It is to be observed that the person to decide was not a particular individual, in whom, notwithstanding his relation to the company, the contractor might have so much confidence as to agree to be bound by his awards, B but any one from time to time the company might choose to select as their engineer. The appellant alleges that he did not know that Mr. Brunel was a shareholder until more than two years after the works had been begun, but he must have known that the company had it in their power to appoint another engineer in Mr. Brunel's place who might hold shares, or that Mr. Brunel himself might purchase shares. C Without the intervention of the engineer, the contract was, as it were, paralysed; nothing could be done under it. It surely can hardly be argued that a person appointed engineer could, by purchasing shares, render the contract practically inoperative. His Honour the Vice-Chancellor of England, when this case was before him, treated it as a matter of notoriety that engineers employed in forming the line of an intended railway were almost universally holders of shares. Without going D that length, it may be safely affirmed that there is nothing to prevent them from purchasing shares. This must have been known to the appellant, and unless, therefore, he can read the word "engineer" in the contract as meaning by necessary implication an engineer not holding shares in the company, or can import into the contract an agreement, on the part of the company, that no person holding shares should ever be appointed to fill, or should continue to fill, the character of engineer, E he must be bound by the terms of his own agreement. According to that agreement, he bound himself on certain points to abide by the decision of the engineer. He knew that engineer might be or become a shareholder. If he meant that in such a case the authority of the engineer should not be exercised, he ought to have provided for such a contingency. He has not done so, and has, therefore, no just ground for complaint.

F This, therefore, brings us to the question whether, independently of these two special heads of fraud, the appellant has shown a title to relief. His object is to obtain payment for work done by him for the company under the several contracts to which I have already referred. In considering the question I will in the first instance confine the inquiry to the first contract, that designated as the contract 1 B. What were the appellant's rights under that contract? He had a right on G executing the works comprised in that contract to recover from the company the sum of £63,028 16s., and also to be paid according to the rates specified in the schedule for all extra works. He was not to wait for payment till the whole should be finished, but he was to be paid at the end of every fourteen days the value of the work then actually completed, the company deducting one-fifth of the amount until the deductions should amount to £4,000. This £4,000 was to be retained H by the company by way of caution or security till the whole work should be finished. The value of the work done at the end of every fourteen days was to be estimated by the engineer of the company, and payment was to be made on his certificate, which during the progress of the work was to be conclusive, but on the completion of the whole any dispute as to any matter of account between the appellant and the company was to be settled by arbitration. In ascertaining the amount of every I fortnight's certificate, the engineer was to have reference as well to the schedule of prices annexed to the contract as to the entire cost of the whole works. This provision was obviously necessary, for some parts of the works, and those of an expensive nature such as the driving of headways through the tunnels, and the formation of coffer-dams, are not mentioned in the schedule of prices though constituting an important part of the work as described in the specification, and though their cost, according to the appellant's exhibit, formed (as indeed it must have formed) an important element in his calculations which led him to make his tender to do the works for a sum of £63,028 16s.

The precise principle on which the engineer in making his fortnightly certificates was to blend together in his calculation the value of the work done, as deducible from the schedule of prices and from the cost of the whole works, is certainly not clearly explained. In making such an estimate it could hardly be expected that anyone would arrive at a perfectly accurate result, but as the payment to be made on these certificates were only payments on account, extreme accuracy was not essential. Both parties seem to have agreed in leaving it to the engineer to frame the certificates as fairly as he could, so that the work done might as far as possible be paid for as it proceeded, the stipulated deduction of £4,000 being kept back till the final completion. This being the right of the appellant, the case he makes by his bill is that from the very outset the sums certified were greatly below what they ought to have been, and this kept him very deficient in funds so that he was unable to prosecute the works with the same vigour with which he might have proceeded if he had not been unduly straitened for want of money. A

In these circumstances he contends that he is entitled to have an account taken of the work actually done according to what the certificate ought to have been; that the respondents are not at liberty to insist on any penalties for the failure in completing the different portions of the work at the stipulated times; and, moreover, that they were not at liberty to seize and take possession of the plant as forfeited by reason of undue delay in prosecuting the works. [His Lordship described the circumstances under which the certificates were given and continued:] It does not, however, appear to me to be necessary to institute any minute inquiry as to how far the calculations of Mr. Brunel were accurate. I think it is quite enough if they were made bona fide, and with the intention of acting according to the exigency of the terms of the contract. The company expressly stipulated that, during the progress of the work, the decision of the engineer as to the value of the work from time to time executed should be final. If the appellant thought this a harsh or oppressive clause, he ought not to have agreed to it. It does not, however, seem to me to have been unreasonable. In the absence of express stipulation, a person contracting to do any work for another is not entitled to demand payment till the whole has been completed. The nature and extent of such a work as that which the appellant was to perform might well induce a modification of what, in the absence of express contract, would have been the rights of the parties. But, at the same time, the company might reasonably feel that the extent to which any claim by the contractor for payment during the progress of the works should be met must be left in a great measure to themselves. It would never do for persons in the situation of these respondents to put themselves in a position in which a question might be raised with them adversely every fortnight as to the extent of their immediate liability to their contractors. If, indeed, there was anything like fraud or unfairness in the case, different considerations might arise, but the evidence wholly fails to establish anything of the sort. The appellant, in the absence of fraud, was, during the progress of the works, bound by the certificates of the engineer, and, on the whole, I think that he has entirely failed to make out that the certificates were not such as he was entitled to have under the provisions of the contract. B C D E F G H

Supposing that the certificates were such as the respondents were bound to furnish, the next question is whether, in paying to the appellant the amount from time to time certified, the respondents were entitled to deduct the amounts due or claimed to be due for penalties. Such deductions were made on two occasions: first, on the certificate given on Nov. 12, 1836, when the headings through the tunnels were completed, and, secondly, on July 3, 1837. On the first of those occasions a sum of £200 was deducted, being five penalties alleged to be due for delay in completing the headways through tunnels No. 1 and No. 3 at the specified time, and on the second occasion a deduction of £20 was made, as a penalty for delay in the works at the Avon Bridge. These penalties had certainly, according to the express language of the deed, been incurred, and, therefore, the point for decision is whether there was anything, either in the nature of the penalty or the I

A conduct of the parties, to prevent the company from insisting on the literal terms of the contract.

There is no doubt that where the doing of any particular act is secured by a penalty a court of equity in general is anxious to treat the penalty as being merely a mode of securing the due performance of the act contracted to be done and not as a sum of money really intended to be paid. On the other hand, it is certainly

B open to parties who are entering into contracts to stipulate that, on failure to perform what has been agreed to be done, a fixed sum shall be paid by way of compensation. Whether a sum so fixed is to be considered as merely in the nature of a security for the actual amount of damage incurred, or as an agreed amount of liquidated damages, is often a question of great nicety and difficulty. I am not sure

C that benefit has, on the whole, resulted from the struggles which courts, both of law and equity, have made to relieve contracting parties from payments which they have bound themselves to make by way of penalty. Such a course may have been very reasonable and useful where the damage resulting from the violation of the contract is capable of being exactly measured, but whenever the quantum of damage is in its nature uncertain and the due performance of it has been secured, or purports to have been secured, by a penalty, it might, perhaps, have been safer and

D more convenient to have always understood the parties as meaning what their language imports namely, that on failure to perform the contract, the stipulated penalty should be paid. But this has not always been the doctrine of the courts. The distinction between a penalty and a sum fixed as the conventional amount of damages is too well established to be now called in question, however difficult it may be to say in any particular case under which head the stipulation is to be

E classed. I shall presently have occasion to state that the sums in this contract, made payable under the name of penalties, are to be treated as liquidated damages, and not as penalties to secure something unliquidated.

The question only arises on two certificates. If the appellant considered that the company had no right to deduct the penalties, he had only to bring an action on the certificates, and (independently of the question arising from the conduct of the F parties) the point would necessarily have arisen and been decided, at law. The bill cannot, I think, possibly be sustained on the mere ground that the penalties deducted were not intended as more than a mode of securing to the respondents adequate compensation for the damage arising from the appellant's delay. It was argued that, even supposing the penalties are to be treated as sums actually intended to be recoverable, still the conduct of the respondents, and of Mr. Brunel,

G their agent, was such as to preclude them, at all events so far as relates to the £200 deducted in November, 1836, from insisting on the penalties, whether they are to be treated as sums actually due, or as mere security for unascertained damage. Mr. Brunel, it was argued, by the arrangement already referred to, made with the appellant on July 20, 1836, agreed to give him an extension of time for perfecting the headings through the tunnels, and, as they were all finished before

H the end of the extended time, it cannot now be allowed to the company to insist on any penalties for their non-completion at the time originally contemplated. It is not necessary to discuss the question as to the power of Mr. Brunel to vary the rights of the respondents under the contract by any such arrangement as has been suggested, because I am clearly of opinion that no such agreement as that suggested was in fact made. Mr. Brunel found the appellant greatly behind with his works,

I and thought, whether rightly or not is immaterial, that he ought not to sign any more certificates until the headings had been completed. He thought, however, that in spite of the backward state of the works, the headings might be perfected before certain specified days, if the appellant would proceed with greatly increased vigour and diligence; and what he agreed was, that, if the appellant would increase his exertions so as to secure his completing the headings before certain specified days, he would, though he did not feel warranted in signing certificates, induce the respondents to advance large sums on account so as in effect to give the appellant the same benefit as he would have had if certificates had been given. To this arrangement the appellant acceded. It clearly did not imply necessarily that the rights of the company arising out of the failure to do the particular portion of the work by the days originally agreed on should be affected, and that the appellant did not understand it as having any such meaning must, I think, be inferred from the fact that he accepted payment with notice of the deduction, and made no objection, though in effect, he was invited so to do if he was dissatisfied. Mr. Brunel denies that he ever stated that any penalties would not be enforced, and I am satisfied of the truth of what he so states. This deduction of penalties, does not, therefore, appear to me to afford any ground for sustaining the bill. A B

Being, therefore, of opinion that the appellant has failed to establish any title to equitable relief, grounded either on the alleged insufficiency of the sums certified or of the deductions made for penalties, I come next to consider whether he has made any case for equitable relief by reason of the course taken by the respondents in taking possession of the works on July 2, 1838. The appellant says that he was proceeding duly to complete the works according to the terms of the contract, when, on July 2, 1838, the respondents wrongfully took possession of all his stock of materials, tools, and implements, turned him off the ground, and took the completion of the works into their own hands. This, the appellant contends, was in effect an abandonment or a repudiation of the contract, so that without reference to the agreed sum of £63,028 he is entitled to have an account taken of the work actually done, and of the machinery, tools, materials, etc., taken possession of by the respondents. I do not think that, even if the appellant had made out what he contends for, namely, that in taking possession of the works the respondents were guilty of a wrongful act, and that they did what the contract did not authorise them to do, the consequence would have been to entitle the appellant to the relief which he asks. If, while he was duly proceeding to fulfil his contract, he was wrongfully impeded by the respondents and by them prevented from doing what he had undertaken to do, they would be answerable to him in damages for all the consequences of their wrongful act. Such damages would, of course, be in part calculated on the value of the plant, and other articles of which he had been wrongfully deprived, but the effect would not be to alter the relative position of the parties as to the contract itself, and to entitle the appellant to say there had been no contract or that he was to be paid for what he had done without reference to the contract. That would not be the consequence of the act of the respondents even treating it as wrongful. The right of the appellant would be to recover such an amount of damages as would put him as nearly as possible in the same position as if no such wrong had been committed, that is, not as if there had been no contract, but as if he had been allowed to complete the contract without interruption. This was his legal right, and I can discover nothing entitling him to any relief beyond that resulting from the enforcing of that right—nothing which can enable him to convert a wrongful act which entitled him to damages into an act which entitled him to an account of work already done, to be taken on terms different from those for which he had contracted. I have assumed that the company on taking possession of the works were guilty of a wrongful act—that they did something not warranted by the contract, but this is not admitted by them. They contend that what they did was warranted by the contract, and the appellant has not case of complaint whatever at law or in equity. This question is one partly of law and partly of fact, and it turns on the following clause of the deed : C D E F G H I

“And further that in case the said W. Ranger shall become insolvent, or be declared bankrupt, or shall from any cause whatsoever other than any arising from the act of the said company, their engineer, or authorised agents, be prevented from or delayed in proceeding with and completing the said works according to this present contract, or shall not commence or proceed in the said works to the satisfaction of the said company, it shall be lawful to and for the said company, if they shall think fit, to give or cause to be given, or left with or at the usual place of abode of the said W. And, further, that all the balance and moneys whatsoever which then or thereafter would have been or become due or payable to the said W. Ranger under this contract, if this present clause had not been inserted, together with all the E tools and materials then delivered for the purpose of the works hereby contracted for, and then being upon or about the site of the said works, shall, upon such default as aforesaid, become and be in all respects considered as the absolute property of the said company. And further, that if the said balance, moneys, and materials so to become the property of the said company as last aforesaid, shall be insufficient to cover such charges for workmen and materials as are hereinbefore lastly directed to be paid thereout, and also the charges and F expenses of keeping such works in repair for the space of one year after the completion thereof, then the said W. Ranger, his heirs, executors, and administrators, shall and will make good and pay to the said company such deficiency on demand."

The first point to be decided on this clause is one of law. What is the construction G of this contract? In what circumstances would the company have a right under the contract to take possession of the appellant's tools and materials, and to complete the works themselves? That a state of circumstances might arise giving to them such a right is a matter of no doubt. If, for instance, the appellant had deserted the works in order to prosecute some more profitable engagement elsewhere, there can be no doubt that in such a case the rights of the respondents stipulated for by the H clause in question would have arisen. How then was it to be decided, whether such a right had or had not arisen? This can only be answered by attending to the precise terms of the clause. The provision is that if the appellant shall not proceed with the works to the satisfaction of the company, they may give him notice in writing calling on him to proceed regularly, and then if he shall for seven days make default in regularly proceeding with the works, the company may employ I other workmen, and act on the clause in question. The company might give the notice if they were dissatisfied, reasonably or unreasonably, with the appellant's rate of progress, or mode of proceeding. They were the sole judges of the necessity for or expediency of giving such a notice. Their dissatisfaction with the rate or mode of proceeding was a sufficient reason for such a notice. But when the notice was given, their right to act on it depended, not on their view of the appellant's conduct, not on the question whether they were or were not satisfied with him, but on the fact whether, after receipt of the notice, he did or did not for seven days make default in regularly proceeding with the works.

This being the nature of the right, the question becomes one of fact. The respondents having given the notice required by the deed, was the appellant's conduct, after receipt of the notice, such as to justify the respondents in what they did? They must, in order to sustain the validity of their acts, establish as a matter of fact, that the appellant did for seven days after receipt of the notice make default in proceeding regularly, which, I take it, means proceeding with reasonable skill and diligence in the prosecution of the works. [His LORDSHIP stated that the evidence showed that the appellant did make such default.] It is not, however, necessary to decide whether the evidence is so clear as to preclude the necessity for further inquiry, for even if any inference on this point is not just—if, in fact, there was no such default as warranted the course taken by the company—still the result was only to confer on the appellant a right of action to recover damages for the wrong inflicted on him, not a right to treat himself as absolved from the contract and as entitled to be paid for the work he had done as if the contract had never existed. So far, therefore, as relates to the contract 1 B the appellant has failed to show any title to the relief which he asks, being, in substance, a right to payment for the work done irrespective of the contract.

[As regards the contracts designated as 2 B and 8 L, His LORDSHIP said that they were in terms the same as the 1 B contract, and the same observations applied to them.]

The bill then prays a declaration that the appellant did not incur any penalties, or if he did, they were waived, or that the appellant is entitled to be relieved from them. I have already stated my opinion that what are in these contracts called penalties are, in fact, fixed sums agreed upon as the conventional amount of damages to be paid by the contractor in the event of his failing to do certain portions of the work before certain defined times. Nothing could be more reasonable than such a stipulation. It was obviously of vital importance to the company that the works should be completed by a stipulated time, and in order to secure the object they made it a matter of positive contract that certain particular portions of the work should be finished by certain specified times, and on failure to fulfil this engagement the contractor bound himself to pay certain stipulated sums, increasing every week as the increased delay might be likely to be more and more injurious to the company. All the circumstances which have been relied on in the different reported cases, as distinguishing liquidated damages from penalty, are to be found here. The injury to be guarded against was one incapable of exact calculation. The sum to be paid is not the same for every default, for that which should occasion small as for that which should occasion great inconvenience, but one increasing as the inconvenience would become more and more pressing, and finally, the payments are themselves secured by the penalty of a bond. This is hardly consistent with the notion that the payments secured were themselves only penal sums to secure something else. For these reasons I think it clear, that these payments, though called penalties, are, in truth, liquidated damages agreed on by the parties, which the company might set off against the demand of the appellant upon them under the contract. I think it abundantly clear, that from the very commencement of the works the appellant had not sufficient strength to prosecute them with the necessary dispatch. It may be—he says it was—that the cuttings were of a much more difficult and laborious character than he had anticipated. But from whatever cause, he certainly did not advance with the rapidity which the engineer required and which he had promised, and I see nothing whatever fixing the blame on any one but the appellant himself. On the whole, therefore, I come to the conclusion that there was nothing to deprive the respondents of the right to fix the appellant with these sums payable by way of liquidated damages according to the contract, and there certainly is nothing to warrant the declaration asked for, that the company ever waived or abandoned their rights.

The bill next prays a declaration that the company were not entitled to give the notice of June 23, 1838, under which, on July 2 following, they took possession of all the plant and works in the contracts 1 B and 2 B, including the 1 B extension.

A and, further, a declaration that they were not justified in taking such possession, and that they may be ordered to account for and pay to the appellant the value of the plant and property of which they so unjustly possessed themselves. The supplemental bill prays a similar declaration and similar relief in respect to the plant and stock on the Reading line, of which the company took possession on Aug. 20, 1838. The right of the company to take possession of these works depends on the question whether, after the giving of the notices, the appellant did or did not make default in regularly proceeding with the works. If he did not, then the company or their servants were trespassers, and so were responsible in damages. This, however, is not the right insisted on by the appellant. The bill, after asking the declarations as to the seizures to which I have referred, goes on to pray for accounts of what is due to the appellant on the footing of there never having been any contracts, or of the contracts having been abandoned, and this is clearly an erroneous view of his rights, whether the seizures were or were not justifiable.

The bill further prays, that in taking the accounts of what is due to the plaintiff, it may be ascertained what was due to him at the several dates of the different advances made to him by way of mortgage, and that those advances may be treated to the extent of the sums then due as being payments and not loans, with the necessary consequential directions. This relief is asked on the notion that the sums to be treated as actually payable from time to time during the progress of the works were not the sums certified by the engineer, but such sums as the master should find to be the real value of the work done, disregarding the contracts altogether. This as I have already explained, is an erroneous view of the appellant's right. The contracts cannot be disregarded, and according to the contracts nothing was payable during the progress of the works except the sums certified, and at the times of the several mortgage advances all these sums had been fully paid. The company, therefore, had a clear right to the full benefit of all the securities given by the appellant for the several advances made by way of loan on mortgage of the plant, the stock, and the reserved fund, and the appellant could not be entitled to an account on any other principle.

F The bill prays, lastly, that an account may be taken of the engines, tools, materials, articles, and things of which the company took possession, and that they may be debited in account with the value thereof, with interest for the same. The right of the appellant to such an account depends on the question whether, according to the true construction of the agreement, the company were, on taking possession of the plant, to become absolute owners of it to all intents and purposes, or whether the possession was only to be for the purpose of enabling them to go on with the works, and to complete them at the risk and cost of the appellant, holding the plant as a security, so far as it would go, for whatever outlay, if any, they might have to make beyond what they would have had to pay under the contract in case the appellant had duly performed his engagement.

The provisions of the contract are very explicit. First, upon the appellant's default after seven days' notice the company were authorised to proceed and complete the works themselves, paying for the same out of the money then remaining due to the appellant on account of the contract. Secondly, the payments then already made to the appellant were to be taken as full satisfaction for all works then already done by him. Thirdly, all money then due, or which would thereafter have become due to him under the contract, and all the tools and materials in and about the works, were to become the absolute property of the company. Fourthly, if the moneys, tools, and materials so to become the property of the company, should be insufficient to cover all their charges in completing the works, then the appellant was to make good the deficiency. I assume that, in taking possession of the plant, the company did no more than, under these clauses, they were warranted in doing. The question is whether, having taken possession, they became absolutely entitled to all they seized, or whether the whole provision is not to be regarded as mere machinery for enabling them to complete the works at the risk and cost of the appellant. I think the latter is the true construction of the clauses.

When I was considering the question whether the penalties for delay were to be treated as mere penalties to secure the due performance of the work or as liquidated damages to be paid for each default, I observed that one argument, leading strongly to the latter conclusion, was founded on the uncertain nature of the damage to be provided against, that is to say, on the impossibility of saying (as matter of mere calculation) how much the company were prejudiced by the fact that a particular portion of the work was delayed for a week, or a fortnight, or a month. This of itself afforded strong ground for construing the clause as meaning to fix the amount of damage, as being intended to make certain what was otherwise uncertain. But this test fails in the clauses now under consideration. The object of these clauses was to enable the company to do, at the cost of the appellant, the work which he had failed, or seemed likely to fail in himself. The amount of their damage was capable of such admeasurement; it was the sum which they should expend in doing what the appellant ought to have done, less the amount payable to the appellant. In such a case, if the property is made available as a fund for indemnifying the company, all the ends of the clauses in question are fully answered.

It is to be observed that the property seized comprised, inter alia, the three reserved sums of £4,000 each. It could hardly have been in the contemplation of the parties that, without reference to what the company should be obliged to spend in completing the works, they should be at liberty to appropriate to themselves three sums of money amounting to £12,000, and that even though the work remaining to be completed might not amount to £1,000. Further, it was clearly contemplated that the company should keep an account, not only of all which they expended in completing the works, but also of all which they made by the tools and materials seized, for the appellant was to make good any deficiency, and the amount of the deficiency could only be ascertained by keeping accounts of all which was realised, and if accounts were to be kept for the purpose of charging the contractor with the deficiency, it can hardly be supposed to have been the intention of the parties that, if there was a surplus, the company should retain it for their own use. Again, it is to be observed, that the right of the company to make the seizure would, in case of seven days' default after notice, arise at any period of the contract—that is, when work to the amount of only £1,000 or £100 remained to be done, as well as when work to the amount of £50,000 was incomplete. The evidence as to the value of the plant is conflicting, but it could hardly be stated on a rough estimate at less than £10,000, in addition to which there were the three reserved sums of £4,000 each.

It could hardly have been intended that the company should be at liberty to appropriate to themselves the whole of this large stock and these sums of money without reference to the amount of what remained to be done; that they should be at liberty to make a profit from the default of the appellant—a profit which should be so much the larger exactly as the default was less inconvenient to the company. There are cases in which the mere fact that the same sum is made payable for a small default as for a large one has been held to prove that the sum so payable was meant merely as a penalty to secure the due performance of the act intended to be provided for, and not as a sum really recoverable. The same principle is applicable here. A default on the part of the contractor might be very injurious at one stage of the works, and very unimportant at another. So long as a large portion of the works remained to be done, a large fund might be necessary to indemnify the company when driven to undertake the prosecution of the works themselves, but when very little remained to be done that which was only a reasonable security in the former case would become excessive. On these grounds I have come to the conclusion that the true meaning of this part of the contract is that the company, though at liberty to seize and appropriate the plant belonging to the appellant, were yet bound to account for its value in settling their accounts with him.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I cannot sufficiently express my admiration of the great clearness of the statements of my noble and learned friend who has so ably gone through the whole particulars of the case, or of the acuteness, only to be equalled

A by the patience, which he has shown in bringing the whole of these matters before the House. It is for me only to address a few observations to your Lordships upon those parts of the case on which I originally entertained some doubt, and I think it better that I should confine myself to those points than that I should endeavour to follow my noble and learned friend over the whole ground.

B The first prayers of this bill refer to fraud and imposition. The first alleged imposition is respecting the fallacious representations which have been made touching the kind of stone through which the railway was to be made; the second is respecting the possession of shares by the engineer, Mr. Brunel, unknown to the appellant. Upon one only of these heads am I about to offer any remarks to your Lordships. I mean the second—that respecting the possession of shares by the engineer. The first, respecting the alleged fallacious misrepresentations made to
C the contractor respecting the nature of the strata, has been so ably discussed by my noble and learned friend upon grounds on which I entirely agree with him that I have only one single remark to make respecting the sandstone which I think he omitted—namely, that there appears from the evidence to be almost as great a difference in the hardness of the sandstone and the consequent difficulty of working through it as of the other kind of strata that were alleged to be in contrast with it.

D We come to the possession of the shares by the engineer, upon which I certainly originally entertained very considerable doubt, but, upon further consideration of the particulars of the relative position of the principal engineer and the company, and also of the relative position of the engineer and the company, on the one hand, and the contractor of the other, under contracts 1, 2, and 8, I have made up my mind to agree with my noble and learned friend in the conclusion that this does
E not, when well and duly considered, support the claim of the appellant. The position of the engineer was such that he really may be said to have, in some respects altogether and in all respects almost altogether, represented the company. He may almost be taken for the company in all respects, but in some respects he must be taken altogether as being the company.

F Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal Proprietors (1) is the case of a judge, a person clothed with high judicial functions, being found to have been a party in the case owing to his being interested in the subject-matter which came before him for his decision. We have here a case, not of a judge—not indeed of anything like a judge.

The utmost that he can be said to be is a kind of referee, to whom certain matters were by the agreement of the parties to be referred—I will not say for his arbitration, but rather for his report and acting upon. In some respects it is found that the G company is often stated in the alternative. It is said:

“If it shall appear to the company, or their principal engineer for the time being, or his assistant resident engineer”;

and,

H “in all cases proper materials to the satisfaction of the said company or their principal engineer.”

Looking at him in regard to those matters in which he may be said more to decide judicially—for example, the estimates, and the certificates which he was to give, I consider that here he was the known officer of the company. He is not named personally as Mr. Brunel, but as “the principal engineer for the time being.”

I Whoever the company appointed as the engineer for the time being was, he was to give these certificates and make these payments. Nay, moreover he is to decide as it were upon appeals from the assistant or resident engineer, for it is provided that the resident engineer differing from the contractor upon certain matters, Mr. Brunel is to decide.

Then, my Lords, was it not known to the contractor, that Mr. Brunel was the engineer of the company, that he was largely interested on the side of the company as their paid servant, and largely profiting by his connection with the company? Was it not known that he might hold shares in the company? Was it not generally understood among engineers (though I do not go so far as the Vice-Chancellor of England, who said it was notorious that in all instances the engineers were shareholders), and must it not have been very well known to Mr. Ranger, that it was an ordinary case for an engineer to hold shares? He might have made that an exception in the contract, and required that he should not hold shares, but that provision was not made. The interest which he had in shares was trifling compared with his general interest arising out of his connection with the company. Had this proviso been made, the absurdity would happen to which my noble and learned friend has adverted, that, although not possessed of shares at that time, he might any day have purchased them, nay more, he might have inherited them; they might have come to him by descent, and then he would have been put in this position—that he must either have given up what had come to him, or have ceased to be the engineer employed by the company, for if he had continued possessed, either by purchase or inheritance, of a single share, according to the rigour of the argument deduced from Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal Proprietors (1), he must have ceased to act under these covenants, and the whole operations of the company must at once have been convulsed. I think, therefore, my Lords, upon the whole, there is no ground for considering that the position in which he was placed was a quasi judicial position. I think it is clear that he was the company; that the contractor considered him as the company; that in all matters the interests of the company and of their engineer were the same; and that with his eyes open, he put himself to a certain degree in the hands of the company, only securing himself by the express stipulations which are made to limit the discretion of the company. I look upon Mr. Brunel, the principal engineer for the time being in this case, as the company itself.

I have known cases in which, in private local Acts of considerable importance, there has been an express provision that certain judicial proceedings shall take place in which a jury shall be impanelled and shall act under one or other of the directors of the company. Although the company is, in fact, the party interested, yet one or other of their directors sits to direct the jury, to dispose of questions of evidence, and to decide upon the admission of one piece of evidence and the rejection of another; and this is the case although the director was the party between whom and the claimant to compensation the whole proceedings were going on. This is found to be a convenient arrangement, and an arrangement of that sort, for the convenience of the work and of both parties, appears to have been voluntarily entered into by the parties to this suit.

[His LORDSHIP dealt with questions of fact which do not call for report and continued:] The last point upon which I have a word to say in addition to the statement of my noble and learned friend, refers to the question of liquidated damages. I greatly lament that the law has been so laid down by cases upon which it is too late to make any comment, as to make the question whether a sum is to be regarded as a penalty or as liquidated damages depend in every case on the intention of the parties. I think this has been lamented formerly by learned judges, and although Lord ELDON very cautiously, as was his wont, expresses himself on this matter, yet it is impossible to read what he said in Astley v. Weldon (2), the leading case on the subject, in the Court of Common Pleas during the short time that that most learned judge sat in that court, without seeing that he was dissatisfied with the former current of cases. He expresses the great difficulty which he had often found in making his way through these cases, and I think there can be but little doubt that he lamented the course which the law had taken. But, my Lords, it is now too late to alter this, and we are in every case bound to consider whether we are to grant liquidated damages or penalties according to the principles that those cases had established. According to those principles I have no doubt whatever that, in this case, liquidated damages are due as regards the fourth prayer of the bill—I mean those injuries sustained by the company by the delay where that delay was increasing and in which no specific sum could be apportioned in respect of a particular injury done to the company. I agree with my noble and learned friend that we must consider the sums in question as liquidated damages—

A as a compensation to the company for the loss sustained by the delay. In another instance it is equally clear, upon the principles laid down, both in Astley v. Weldon (2), and also in Charrington v. Laing (3) that it is to be taken as penalty.

B There can be no doubt that the court from which this appeal comes went as far as possible in setting aside all reference to the intention of the parties, and held, distinguishing between the different matters which were in the consideration of the parties when they entered into the covenant, that one was to be taken as liquidated damages, and another as penalty, although it was perfectly clear, as clear as words could make it, that the parties had intended the whole to be taken as liquidated damages and not as penalty. The learned judge, in giving the decision of the court, says :

C "It is difficult to suppose any words more explicit or express than those used in the agreement; the same declaration not only states affirmatively that the sum of £1,000 should be taken as liquidated damages, but negatively also that it should not be considered as a penalty, or in the nature of a penalty."

Yet, nevertheless, because there were some things that were so specific and others less specific and more general, the court thought they were bound by the current of cases to draw that distinction between the two, and that in spite of the positive and distinct statement of the meaning of the parties, they were bound to consider that the parties did not mean that to be taken as to the whole, but only as to a part, and, therefore, to decide that a part of the sum should be penalty although the parties had said that none should be penalty, and that the other part should be liquidated damages although the parties intended that this character should apply to the whole. The result is as has been stated by my noble and learned friend.

SCOTTISH MARINE INSURANCE CO. v. TURNER AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Cranworth, L.C., Lord Truro and other Lords), February 15, 17, March 3, 1853]

G

[Reported 4 H.L.Cas. 312, n.; 21 L.T.O.S. 10; 17 Jur. 631;
1 W.R. 537; 1 Macq. 334; 10 W.R. 483]

Insurance—Marine insurance—Freight—Constructive loss of ship—Abandonment to insurers of ship—Receipt of freight by owners—Payment over to insurers of ship—Liability of insurers of freight.

H

A ship, valued at £7,500, was insured from Quebec to a port in the United Kingdom, on ship and also, with the appellant insurance company, on freight. During the voyage she encountered an iceberg which damaged her, but she was kept afloat till she neared Liverpool, where the dock-master refused to admit her into dock owing to her disabled condition and ordered her to lie outside. When the tide went out she grounded and fell outwards, thereby receiving additional damage. She was afterwards floated into dock, her cargo was delivered, and the freight was paid to the owners. She was then surveyed and pronounced to be a wreck and only worth £475. The owners thereupon abandoned the ship to the insurers and claimed for a total loss. Payment being refused, the owners brought an action, the jury found that the vessel was a total loss at the date of the second accident, and was rightly abandoned, and the court held that the underwriters on ship thereby became entitled to the freight. This was paid to them by the owners, who then sued the appellants, as insurers on freight, as for a total loss of freight.

Held: the freight insured was actually earned and received by the owners, who, but for their act in abandoning the ship after the receipt of the freight, might have retained it for their own use, and, therefore, the appellants were not liable and the respondents' action did not lie. A

Notes. It is now commonly provided in freight policies that the amount insured shall be paid in full in the event of the total loss, whether actual or constructive, of the ship: see Institute Voyage Clauses, Freight, cl. 6. B

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Court of Session in an action on a policy of insurance of freight.

- C The respondents were owners of the ship Laurel, of Greenock, which was valued at £7,500. She was insured to the extent of £6,500, the owners being their own insurers for the remaining £1,000. The appellants were insurers of the ship to the extent of £1,500. The freight was also insured to the amount of £1,500, of which £1,000 were undertaken by the appellants. This policy effected with the appellants on the freight (on which the present action was brought) was dated July 15, 1842, and bore to be

- D "at and from Quebec to a port of discharge in the United Kingdom, beginning the said adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof aboard the said ship as above," and continuing upon the said ship

- E "until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety, and upon the goods and merchandises until the same be there discharged and safely landed."

The risks were described in the usual terms, perils of the seas, men-of-war, fire, etc.,

"and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises, and ship, etc., or any part thereof."

- F The ship performed her outward voyage with safety, and at Quebec loaded for her return a cargo of timber, staves and flour. She left Quebec on July 14, 1842. On July 27 she came into contact with an iceberg, there being at the time strong breezes and a thick fog. Her bows and topgallant forecastle were stove in, and otherwise she was so damaged that she immediately filled and became waterlogged, and was thus reduced to a wrecked or sinking condition. By the exertions, however, of the crew, and owing to her cargo being timber, she was kept afloat, and ultimately arrived off Liverpool on Aug. 11. The dockmaster, on seeing her disabled condition, refused to receive her within the dock, and directed her to be moored outside, so that, when the tide left, she might be scuttled. The result was that she grounded, fell outwards, and sustained additional injury. When the tide receded holes were bored in the bottom, and the water allowed to run out. These openings were afterwards closed, and the wreck was ultimately floated into the dock, when the cargo was discharged, it having escaped uninjured. The owners received the freight from the consignees, amounting to £1,402 2s. 2d. On Sept. 1, after the cargo was cleared out, the owners had the wreck surveyed, and, finding her damage so great that the expense of the repairs would far exceed her value, they intimated an abandonment to the underwriters of the ship and their intention to claim for a total loss. No notice was sent to the underwriters of freight. Some of the underwriters of the ship having refused to pay except for a partial loss, an action was brought in Scotland by the owners against one of these underwriters to recover for a total loss. This action was entitled Stewart v. Greenock Marine Insurance Co. (1). It went to trial on the issue

"whether the Laurel, by and through injury sustained on or about July 27, 1842, and on or about Aug. 11, 1842, or one or other of these dates, and during the currency of the policy (on the ship), became a wreck and was totally lost."

The jury returned the following verdict :

"Find for the plaintiffs in respect that the Laurel was properly abandoned, and not worth repairing, and that her damage arose from her coming in contact with an iceberg, and also from grounding at the dock at Liverpool. Also find that the ship was perfectly seaworthy, reserving for the decision of the court the point raised by the defendants of their title to a proportion of the freight. Also find that the vessel was a total loss, irrespective of the decayed timber and deficient sails."

With respect to the question submitted by the verdict to the court, it was afterwards decided by the court that the underwriters of the ship were entitled to the freight earned subsequently to Aug. 11, the date of the accident in the Mersey. An appeal to the House of Lords was entered against that decision, and after argument LORD COTTENHAM confirmed it : see Stewart v. Greenock Marine Insurance Co. (1).

The owners, having under the above judgment paid over the freight which they had received to the underwriters of ship, brought the present action against the underwriters of freight to recover for a total loss of freight. The insurers demurred on the ground that there had been no loss of the freight within the policy; that the damage sustained by the ship did not disable the ship from earning freight; and that the owners themselves had de facto earned and received the freight. The court below, by a majority of three to one, gave judgment for the respondent, and the appellants appealed.

Sir Frederic Thesiger and Willes for the appellants.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Serjeant Byles, and Burnie for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Mar. 3, 1853. The following opinions were read.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—I have given very anxious attention to the able and well-reasoned judgments which fully disclose the grounds upon which the court below proceeded. Those grounds were these. First, they considered that there was a total and actual loss of the ship before she was brought into dock. Secondly, that being so, and the ship having been abandoned to the underwriters, or, at all events, notice of the loss having been duly given to them, the damaged vessel became their property as from the time of the fatal injury, say on Aug. 11. It is immaterial whether it was Aug. 11 or July 27 before she got into dock. Thirdly, the court considered the legal consequence of such a state of facts as established by Case v. Davidson (2), and a case in your Lordships' House, arising out of this very transaction (Stewart v. Greenock Marine Insurance Co. (1)), to be, that freight accruing due after Aug. 11 (which includes all the freight of the ship) belonged not to the owners, but to the insurers of the ship, and so was lost to the owners. Fourthly, the court held, that the cause of this loss of freight to the owners was the loss of the ship by perils of the sea, and so the freight was lost by one of the perils insured against.

These are the grounds on which the Court of Session proceeded. But with all respect to the distinguished persons by whom these judgments were pronounced, I think they rest on an unsound foundation. I do not think that, as between the parties in this cause, it can be said that the ship was totally lost during her voyage. That she was not, in fact, lost is certain, for she arrived at Liverpool—was there brought into dock—her cargo was safely delivered to the consignees, and the freight was paid to the owners. How then, it may be said, is this consistent with the verdict of the jury in the action against the underwriters of the ship, which finds expressly that the vessel was a total loss irrespective of the decayed timber and deficient sails? To this I answer, that the verdict was altogether res inter alios acta. As between the underwriters on the ship and the assured, it might be proper to treat the damage as a total loss. But it does not follow that it can be so treated as between the owners and other persons—as between the owners, for example, and the underwriters of the freight. When it is said that, as between the owners and

A the underwriters of the ship, there had been a total loss, all that is meant is that the circumstances of the case were such as gave to the owners the same rights against the insurers of the ship as if there had actually been a total loss. It does not by any means follow that the same circumstances will give to the owners similar rights against other persons. When the cargo was delivered to the consignees and the freight paid, the owners might, if they had thought it for their interest, have retained the damaged vessel, and come on the insurers for the cost of repairing her, or for a due proportion of that cost. In such a case there could have been no possible claim on the appellants, the underwriters of the freight. Their contract would have been performed. How can the right of the owners to enforce against third persons claims resting on what is in truth a fiction, namely, on the assumption that the ship did not perform her voyage, give them any right against those whose contract was actually performed?

The learned judges in the Court of Session seem to doubt whether the contract of the underwriters on the freight was performed; whether the sum paid to the owners by the consignees, on delivery of the cargo at Liverpool, could be treated as freight; whether it was not rather to be regarded as in the nature of salvage, paid indeed to the owners, but paid to them only as agents of the underwriters on the ship.

D I do not, however, think there is any ground for such a doubt. The sum paid to the owners by the consignees was due for freight, and for nothing else; and if payment had been withheld, there can be no doubt but that an action could have been maintained by the owners for freight, immediately on delivery of the cargo. None but the owners could have maintained such an action, and they could maintain it only by virtue of their original contract of affreightment. What the underwriters on freight undertook was that the voyage should be so performed as that the owners should be able to deliver the cargo, and so be in a condition to assert their title to freight; and this state of things actually occurred. It is true that the Court of Session first, and afterwards this House, in the action by the underwriters on the ship against the owners, decided that the sums paid for freight were paid to the owners, not for their own benefit, but for the use and behoof of the insurers; and it was strongly contended at your Lordships' Bar, that the contract into which the appellants, the underwriters on freight, entered with the owners was that the voyage should be so performed as to entitle the owners to recover the freight for their own use, and not merely as agents or trustees for others. The decision in the action by the owners against the insurers of the ship has been that under the circumstances the freight was due, not to the former, but to the latter, and so it was said the contract of the underwriters on the freight was not performed; but this reasoning rests on a fallacy. The underwriters on the freight engaged that the ship should not be prevented by perils of the sea from enabling the owners to earn her freight. Nor was she so prevented; for, in spite of those perils, she arrived in port under the conduct of the owners, and obtained payment of her freight. The right of the underwriters to claim that freight against the owners arose, not from perils of the sea, but from the election made by the owners after the freight had been earned and paid them, to treat the ship as wholly lost on or before Aug. 11. Where a ship has received such an injury as entitles the owner to treat it as totally lost, and the owner consequently abandons it to the underwriters, they, if they repair and navigate her, come in as assignees, and so are entitled to all freight afterwards earned. In such a case the owner has been compelled by perils of the sea to abandon the ship, and so he loses not only the ship, but all possibility of earning freight.

It was to this state of circumstances that TINDAL, C.-J., refers in Benson v. Chapman (3), where he says (6 Man. & G. at p. 810)

"The assured has sustained a total loss of the freight if he abandons the ship to the underwriters on ship, and is justified in so doing; for after such abandonment he has no longer the means of earning the freight, or the possibility of ever receiving it, if earned; such freight going to the underwriters on ship."

But there the very learned Chief Justice was referring to what was then treated as a total loss and abandonment to the underwriters before the freight was earned. The distinction between Benson v. Chapman (3), according to what were supposed in the Common Pleas to be the facts, and the present case is that there, before any freight had been earned, there had been a damage so serious as to justify the owner in treating it as a total loss and abandoning the ship to the underwriters, whereas here the owners remained in actual possession till after the freight had been earned, and earned by reason of the ship having actually performed the voyage in question. I do not apprehend that there is any doubt as to the soundness of the doctrine laid down by TINDAL, C.J., though the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was reversed by the Exchequer Chamber, and that reversal was afterwards sustained by this House. That reversal proceeded on the ground, not that the views of the Chief Justice were erroneous if the facts had been such as they were supposed to be in the court below before the facts had been put on the record in the form of a special verdict, viz., that there had been a total loss and abandonment, but because it was considered that the facts found in the special verdict did not show that there had been a total loss and abandonment, so that the principles laid down by the Chief Justice were inapplicable.

It was argued at your Lordships' Bar that here the circumstances are precisely those to which the Chief Justice referred and on which he relied, namely, an abandonment to the underwriters on the ship in consequence of damage so serious as to have justified such an abandonment. This, it was said, was a total loss, and so the doctrine of the Chief Justice, that there was a total loss of freight as well as of ship, is strictly applicable. There is, however, a manifest and most important difference between the case on which TINDAL, C.J., was reasoning and the present. The Chief Justice was referring to a case of loss and abandonment during the course of the voyage, and before the freight had been earned. Here, though, according to the verdict, the ship was totally lost, yet there was no abandonment till after she had arrived in port, the owners were in a condition to insist on payment of the freight, and that freight had been paid to them.

In such a state of things, I concur in what was said by ALDERSON, B., when he delivered in this House the opinion of the judges in Benson v. Chapman (3), when he said (2 H.L.Cas. at p. 721):

"Nor, indeed, is there any instance to be found in which an action for a total loss of freight has been held to be maintainable, where the freight has been actually earned."

The court below seems to me to have fallen into an error by overlooking this distinction. Whatever might be the rights of the owners as between themselves and the insurers of the ship, it could not possibly be competent to them, after the freight had been earned, to make an election which should affect the interests of third persons. I am not aware, indeed, of any previous case in which, after a ship had actually performed her voyage, the owners have been permitted, even between themselves and the underwriters on the ship, to treat damage sustained on the voyage as a total loss, abandoning the ship to the underwriters after her arrival in port. I observe that the Lord Chancellor, in moving the judgment of this House in Stewart v. Greenock Marine Insurance Co. (1), where the question was who, as between the owners and the underwriters on the ship, were entitled to the freight earned, cautiously abstains from giving any opinion on the point whether there had been what could justly be treated as a total loss. His Lordship's opinion, indeed, proceeds on the assumption that such was the case, but then he says expressly:

"The facts, as found by the verdict, must be the ground on which the consideration of the question must proceed. . . . The verdict finds, first, that there was a total loss of the Laurel."

Then, proceeding on the ground that, as between the then parties, namely, the owners and the insurers on the ship, there had been what the verdict had con-

Aclusively established to be a total loss, he considers what, as between those parties, were the rights in respect of the freight. That was the sole question then before your Lordships; and the decision then come to does not govern a case where the parties are different and where it is open to the party sought to be charged to contend that, as against him, there cannot be said to have been that total loss the existence of which was the foundation of the former decision.

B On the ground, therefore, that here the freight insured was actually earned and received by the owners, and that but for their act, after such earning and receipt, they might have retained it for their own use, so that the contract into which the appellants entered was strictly performed, I have come to the conclusion that the judgment below was erroneous, and I, therefore, move your Lordships that it be reversed.

C LORD TRURO.—I concur in the conclusion to which my noble and learned friend has arrived, that the judgment which was pronounced in the court below is erroneous, and ought to be reversed. Except that the case is one of considerable importance, I should have been well content to have rested entirely upon the reasons which the noble Lord has given. I think they are perfectly sound. I am satisfied

D that they are consistent with every previous decision, except that which is now the subject of appeal.

Your Lordships are rightly told that in this case the assured upon a policy for freight claims to recover the total loss upon that policy, not by reason that the freight has been actually lost, but by reason that the assured, who has received the freight, is not entitled to retain it for his own use. The case of the respondent,

E as appears upon the record, is that the freight has been earned and has been received, but the assured, by reason of certain circumstances, has been compelled to allow the underwriters upon the ship the freight so earned and so received in an account by way of set-off against the subscription, the amount of which he claims to be entitled to receive. It appears, as your Lordships have heard, that this ship sailed from Quebec on July 14. She arrived in the River Mersey, and at the

F entrance of the Liverpool Docks on Aug. 11. She had been materially damaged on July 27, soon after she sailed from Quebec, by coming in contact with an iceberg, and again sustained considerable damage on Aug. 11 at the entrance into the Liverpool docks. It also appears by the respondents' case, that she was afterwards floated into the basin, and on Aug. 12 or 13 was floated into the dock, where she was moored and remained until the next day, when she was put into a graving

G dock, where she delivered her cargo, and the owner afterwards received freight. Some days after the delivery of the cargo it appeared that the ship was surveyed, and found to be damaged to such an extent, as to render her not worth repairing; whereupon the respondent, the assured, abandoned the ship to the underwriters, and sued them for a total loss, and recovered, but the court, in determining the amount which the respondent was entitled to recover, decided that the underwriters were entitled

H to have credit for the amount of the freight which the respondent had received against the amount of their subscriptions. The assured, being thus compelled to allow in an account with the underwriters in the settlement of the loss the amount of freight, instituted the present suit against the underwriters upon the freight, insisting that, because he was so compelled to allow the freight actually received to the underwriters of the ship, there had been within the meaning of the policy a

I total loss of freight.

The question now before your Lordships is whether, because the underwriters upon the ship were so entitled, which this House has decided they were, to the amount of freight, that in point of law constitutes a total loss of freight within the meaning of the policy. I own it appears to me that the assured's right of abandonment and recovery of a total loss against the underwriters upon the ship has been determined under circumstances somewhat peculiar. The ship actually performed the voyage, a circumstance which, as far as I am aware, has never occurred where the owner has been held entitled to abandon the ship and claim for a total loss, however extensive the damage may have been which was incurred during the voyage. In the cases in which abandonment has hitherto been allowed, the voyage has either been actually lost, or the ship has been placed by the perils insured against in circumstances in which no prudent owner uninsured would do that which has become necessary to enable the ship to perform the voyage. In some of the cases ships have been under capture or detention by hostile powers, or stranded, attended with uncertainty whether the ship could ever be got off in a situation able to prosecute the voyage, or so damaged at an intermediate port as to be either irreparable altogether by reason of her own condition, or for want of the necessary means of repair, or requiring an outlay to enable her to pursue her voyage, such as no prudent owner uninsured would incur. In all these cases, at the time of the abandonment, either the voyage was lost, or in imminent peril of being so. But, as before stated, in this case, though the damage was incurred during the voyage, that is, before she had delivered her cargo in the Liverpool dock, yet that damage did not prevent her from completing her voyage by delivering her cargo and earning her freight. That the underwriters of the ship were liable to indemnify the owner for the pecuniary damages which he would sustain by the outlay necessary to repair the injuries which the ship had received is quite clear, but the decision, by which the right to abandon and recover a total loss was established, appears to me to be somewhat in advance of the previous decisions. A B C D

The case the nearest in point of circumstances is that of Samuel v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co. (4). In that case the ship was insured to the port of London, and was ultimately destined to deliver her cargo in the King's Dock at Deptford. She arrived at the dock gates, but before entering the dock was there totally lost and thereby prevented from completing her voyage. The plaintiff was held entitled to recover for a total loss, but only upon the ground that she was lost during her voyage, that is, before she was moored at the place of her ultimate destination, and her voyage thereby completed. But, as before stated, in the present case, though the damage was during the voyage, the ship was not thereby prevented from completing her voyage. It does not appear to me that, provided the loss occurs during a voyage, it is at all material whether that loss happens a short time after the inception of the risk, or a short time before the voyage is completed. From the commencement to the termination of the risk the effect of the loss is the same inasmuch as the loss during any portion of that interval is equally a loss at whatever time it may occur during the voyage. E F

In the action against the underwriters on the ship in the present case the jury found facts which must be coupled with facts admitted upon the record. This, I think, has been much overlooked, it being a clear principle of law that that which the parties admit upon the face of the record the jury cannot gainsay. It is not within the issue left to them. Their verdict, therefore, must always be construed with reference to the facts admitted upon the face of the record. The verdict in this case, taking it in its terms coupled with the facts admitted upon the record, shows that the ship, although so damaged as not to be worth repairing, had yet performed her voyage. The verdict is certainly not quite so distinct upon some of the material facts as we are accustomed to see verdicts in the English courts. But, the terms of that verdict being taken in connection with the facts admitted upon the record to which that verdict would be appended, and upon which the judgment was pronounced, the facts distinctly appear that the damage sustained by the ship, either by coming in contact with the iceberg or at the pier head, did not prevent her afterwards being floated into the basin, and subsequently into the dock, where she was moored and from which, on the following day, she was taken into the graving dock where she discharged her cargo. It further appeared that some days after this the ship was surveyed. It was at first reported that the cost of repairing her would be £3,000; it was afterwards estimated that it would exceed £4,000, the ship having been valued in the policy at £7,500. Further, it appears that the freight, as before stated, actually earned and paid to the owners, amounted to £1,402 2s. 2d., which is the amount sought to be recovered on the policies on freight. So that the G H I

A verdict, properly construed with reference to the other facts admitted upon the record, by which the parties are conclusively bound, shows that the damage sustained by the ship did not prevent her from completing her voyage and earning her freight. These are facts necessary to be attended to in proceeding with the inquiry as to the rights of the parties in the present case.

B In order to determine whether those facts constitute a loss of freight within the meaning of the policy on freight, it is necessary to consider what are the obligations which the underwriter takes upon himself by that policy. I conceive that the underwriter upon the freight binds himself to indemnify the assured against any loss of freight occasioned by the ship being prevented from performing the voyage insured by any of the perils mentioned in the policy and thereby the freight insured being earned. He does not engage that the assured should be able to procure a loading, or that he should be entitled to retain the freight as between him and any other persons after it shall have been earned. I understand his liability to indemnify against the loss of freight is limited to a loss occasioned by the ship's being prevented from performing the voyage insured by any of the perils within the policy. With a loss of freight sustained from any other cause, or by any other means than the incapacity of the ship to perform the voyage and earn the freight, D I do not understand the underwriter is at all concerned.

In Benson v. Chapman (3), ALDERSON, B., in delivering the opinion of the judges to your Lordships' House, expressly stated that there was no case in which it had been held there was a loss of freight where the voyage had been performed and the freight had been earned, and that the underwriters engaged only that freight should be earned, and it had been earned. I own, my Lords, it struck me with some surprise that that case should be stated, and that principle distinctly enunciated, but yet no answer that I can see is to be found in any part of the argument below, and none has been stated at your Lordships' Bar, which can in any respect impeach the soundness of that general principle which the learned baron pronounced in delivering the opinion of the judges. No case has been cited, and I believe none can be cited, inconsistent with that doctrine. It is correctly stated that the decision of the Common Pleas was upon the distinct ground that the voyage had been lost, that is to say, that the ship had been reduced to such a state of damage by the perils insured against as that she could not be put into a condition to perform the voyage without an outlay such as no uninsured prudent owner would incur. The owner, in order to save the underwriters, would not be bound to do that, greatly to his injury, which he would not do if uninsured, and, therefore, in that respect he was entitled to abandon the ship. When he abandoned the ship, he, of course, would be entitled to nothing which the future owner of the ship might earn by means of the ship, which, though once belonging to the original owner, had ceased to be so by the effect of the abandonment, justified by the consequences of those perils against which he had insured. That judgment, it is true, was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber, the reversal being sustained by this House, but nobody, that H I am aware of, uttered a word tending to impugn the correctness of the law which had been laid down in the Court of Common Pleas. It was argued in the Common Pleas upon a Special Case, that is, a statement of facts agreed to by the parties. That Special Case stated that certain circumstances had occurred to the ship, the parties leaving it to the court to say whether those circumstances amounted to a total loss or not. But when they bring a writ of error to review the judgment, it is I then necessary that that Special Case, with the statement of the circumstances, should be altered so as to state the conclusion of fact to which those circumstances lead. The court, in hearing the argument upon the Special Case in the first instance, draw the conclusion of fact as if they were a jury, but when it goes to a court of error there is no licence to the court of error to draw a conclusion of fact—they can only deal with the facts actually recorded. In the Court of Common Pleas the court inferred that there had been a total loss. When the facts with the conclusions came to be drawn out into the form of a special verdict, the fact was stated that no prudent owner would have incurred the expense which was necessary to repair the ship; but the record did not state that, the ship being at Pernambuco and the owner in England, no prudent owner would have incurred the expense if he had been at Pernambuco. In other words, the captain upon the spot having been induced to repair, exercising his best judgment in regard to the facts, the Case, in stating that no prudent owner here would have incurred the expense, did not state that a prudent owner upon the spot, aware of the facts, which the captain was aware of, would not have repaired. The court of error said, therefore: "We cannot say that a prudent owner at Pernambuco would not have repaired, because you tell us a prudent owner in England would not have repaired. The captain stood in place of the owner, and, therefore, you must give us that conclusion of fact, placing the owner in the situation in which the captain was placed. And unless the verdict states that no prudent owner at Pernambuco would have incurred the expense, we cannot say that the owner was authorised to abandon the ship, because it is only on the footing that no prudent owner in the circumstances in which he is supposed to be placed would incur the expense that he is entitled to abandon her." The judgment, therefore, was reversed, because the court of error could not draw that conclusion of fact upon the special verdict which the Court of Common Pleas had drawn upon the Special Case, the law being perfectly unimpugned either in the Court of Exchequer Chamber or at the Bar of this House. The case, therefore, was ultimately determined upon the ground that there did not appear to have been such a constructive total loss of the ship as to warrant the owner in abandoning her. If the true construction of the policy, or, in other words, the obligation of the underwriters upon the freight, be what I have stated, the facts of this case appear to be conclusive against the claim of the respondent. As I before stated, it appears by the record that the voyage was performed notwithstanding the damage which the ship received, and the freight was not only earned but also received.

The decision against the underwriter below, however, was founded upon a different view of the effect of the policy, and it becomes necessary to examine the correctness of the construction so adopted, and the application of that construction to the facts of this case. The expression "the loss of freight" has two meanings, and the distinction between them and its effects it is material to bear in mind. Freight may be lost in the sense that by reason of the perils insured against the ship has been prevented from earning freight. Or you may use the expression "loss of freight" in the sense that it may be lost to the owner, after it has been earned, by some circumstances unconnected with the contract between the assured and the underwriters on the freight. For a loss of freight in the first sense, that is, the ship being prevented earning the freight by the non-performance of the voyage insured, the underwriter on the freight is liable. But for any loss of freight sustained by the owner after it has been earned, I conceive the underwriter is not liable. I can extract no obligation whatever from the policy which should subject him to such a loss. He has performed his warranty by the freight being earned, and he has no concern whatever with who may be entitled to the freight when so earned. In this case, at the time the owner received the freight, he received it on his own account for his own benefit, and, as the facts then stood, was entitled to retain it against all the world. The contract between the owner and the underwriters on freight had been entirely performed, and the relation between them determined, and the assured was at that time entitled not only to retain the freight, but to recover a full compensation for any pecuniary loss he might have incurred by reason of the damage which his ship had sustained. But having valued his ship at the sum of £7,500 and the cost of the necessary repairs of the damage being £4,000 only, he preferred to claim a total loss and to abandon his ship, and thereby obtain £7,500 rather than to claim a partial loss, by which he would be entitled to recover only his actual damage of £4,000, retaining at the same time his ship. The consequence of his electing to take that course was to make the freight which he had received for his own benefit an item in account between him and the underwriters of the ship, and upon that he founds a claim to a total loss of freight against the appellant. The act of aban-

A donment, if it did not operate as an assignment of the ship, at least enured as a binding agreement to assign it, and thereby invested the underwriter on the ship with all the rights which belonged to him as owner, among which rights it is said was that of having the benefit of the earnings of the ship during the voyage—the assignment by abandonment, as I call it, being supposed to entitle the underwriter to all the profits which had arisen throughout the voyage. If the ship had been

B uninsured, this question could never have arisen.

But it is said that although, if the owner had stood by his own insurer, there would have been no loss, yet, by reason of his having thought fit to make a contract of insurance with others, and afterwards to constitute those insurers owners of the ship in his place, the underwriters on the freight have been guilty of a breach of their contract by not indemnifying him for what he calls a loss of freight arising

C out of his having invested the underwriter of the ship with his title to the freight actually earned. I think such a claim is not founded in law or in justice. If uninsured, there could have been no pretence of loss; but if insured the amount of claim against the underwriter of the freight is, according to the argument of the respondent, to vary according to the proportion in which the assured happens to have insured the ship. Besides, what has been the effect of the judgment? In substance

D to make the underwriter of the freight an insurer of the ship. Hitherto his liability has been to answer for the loss of freight, provided the owner is prevented by the perils insured against from earning freight. But according to the decision freight may be earned, the underwriter upon the freight may have performed his duty, the ship may afterwards be lost in consequence of perils previously incurred, and by reason of such loss of the ship the underwriter upon the freight become liable.

E What does he receive his premium for? That the owner may be enabled to earn the freight, notwithstanding the perils of the sea and the perils of navigation. He knows that the ship may receive such damage as not to be liable to perform the voyage, but the goods may be carried forward and the freight earned. He knows that the insurance upon the ship may be made to last longer than the insurance upon the freight. Look at the form of the policy in question, which is that the

F insurance is to last until ten days after the report of the Custom House of the ship. So that, the ship having arrived and delivered her cargo, the freight earned and paid, if the ship sinks within the time of the insurance of the ship—that sinking resulting from the perils which had been incurred before—the underwriter is to be answerable for the loss of freight because the ship had been lost after the freight had been earned. My Lords, his premium is not measured by any such degree of

G risk. It is not within the terms of his contract—it is not within the spirit of his contract—and I think not within the terms of the policy.

Some question is raised in this case in regard to the necessity of an abandonment, and it is said that, if an abandonment was unnecessarily made, it ought not to affect the rights of the parties. I own I am clearly of opinion that abandonment was at all events essential in this case to entitle the assured to recover for a total

H loss. Whether, where a ship continues to exist in specie, the assured can ever recover for a total loss without abandonment, it is not necessary to consider, because I think that in this case no doubt can be reasonably entertained but that it was competent to the assured to retain his damaged ship, and to recover the £4,000 enabling him to repair, or any other sum of money which he might expend in order to repair the damage which the ship had sustained. The underwriter, if the

I assured had thought fit to claim his indemnity as for a partial loss, could have had no pretence to claim any interest in the damaged ship. The option rested entirely with the assured, either to abandon his ship and claim a total loss, or to repair his ship and claim the partial loss. It does not always become necessary, but, where it does become necessary, the course is for the assured upon the abandonment to assign the ship to the underwriters, as was done in the class of cases which your Lordships will recollect arising out of the Russian embargo. In that case the ships being under embargo, and it being uncertain whether they would be deemed to be captured or released, to put the underwriters in the perfect situation of owners, you find by the reported cases that assignments were generally taken, when the abandonment was made or soon after. Therefore, the option rested with the assured either to abandon and to claim a total loss, or to repair his ship and claim a partial loss, and, unless he had declared his election within a reasonable time after he had become acquainted with the state of his ship, he would have waived his right of election, and his claim would have been confined to a partial loss. The title of the underwriter on the ship to the freight, was not founded upon the policy, or upon the extent of the damage which the ship had sustained, but upon the election of the assured to abandon, that is, to assign his ship to the underwriter; and a doctrine which leads to this, that an arrangement between the assured and the underwriter upon the ship will render an underwriter upon the freight liable to pay a total loss upon the freight, in relief of the underwriter upon the ship, and that in a case where the freight has been actually earned and received—I say such a doctrine as that should be watched with great jealousy. Wherever a ship is so circumstanced as that the assured has an election to treat it either as a total loss or a partial loss, I conceive abandonment is a condition to be performed either prior to or contemporaneously with his claim of total loss. I can see no just ground for doubting that this was at least a case of election, assuming, as I have before stated, that such an election exists after the voyage has been actually performed. The cases in the books, in which it is said that where it is in the option of the assured to claim as for a total or a partial loss, abandonment is necessary to be made within a reasonable time in order to support an election to treat the loss as a total loss, are too numerous and too well known to make it necessary for me to fatigue your Lordships by referring to them by name.

It appears to me, therefore, upon principle, that the judgment which has been pronounced in this case is erroneous, and decidedly at variance with the legal result of the whole record, which shows an ordinary insurance for freight, the voyage performed, and the earning of freight not only not prevented by the perils insured against, but actually accomplished, and the freight actually received by the owner at a time when he might have retained it for his own benefit except for his subsequent voluntary election to constitute the underwriters on the ship, as between him and them, the owners of the ship and thereby transfer his previously-vested right to the freight so earned to them—circumstances negating any breach of the contract on the part of the underwriters upon the freight that the vessel should not be prevented from performing the voyage insured, and thereby entitling the owner to the freight in consequence of any of the perils mentioned in the policy.

In Thompson v. Rowcroft (5), it is said that underwriters on the ship stand in the place of the owner after abandonment, and in Case v. Davidson (2), LORD TENTERDEN says: “abandonment is equivalent to a sale.” There are numerous authorities to the same effect. I think there is no authority in support of the respondents’ claim, but there is authority very strong in opposition to it. In illustration of the effect of a policy on the freight Everth v. Smith (6) may be referred to, by which it was decided that such a policy was not an insurance on specific freight, but on the freight generally, and that, if any freight was brought home, no loss would happen for which the underwriter was liable. M’Carthy v. Abel (7) seems to me directly in point, and was referred to and adopted in Everth v. Smith (6). There were insurances in that case on both ship and freight. The ship had been detained by the Russian government at Riga, and the cargo taken out, and while in that state under detention there was an abandonment of ship and freight to the respective underwriters, all of whom paid the owner for a total loss. The ship, however, was afterwards released, re-loaded her cargo, and performed the voyage, and the underwriters on the ship received the freight, whereupon the assured brought an action on the policy on the freight for a total loss. LORD ELLENBOROUGH, in giving judgment in that case, said (5 East, at p. 397):

“The case resolves itself into a single point, viz., whether the freight had been in this case lost or not. If the fact be merely looked at, freight in the events

A which have happened has not been lost, but has been fully and entirely earned and received by or on behalf of the plaintiff, the assured; and if so, no loss can be properly demandable against the underwriters on the freight, who merely insure against the loss of that particular subject by the assured. But if it have or can be considered as having been in any other manner or sense lost to the owners of the ship, it has become so lost to them, not by means of the perils
B insured against, but by means of an abandonment of the ship, which abandonment was the act of the assured themselves, with which, therefore, and the consequences thereof, the underwriters on freight have no concern. It appears to us, therefore, that quacunque via data—that is, whether there has been no loss at all of freight, or, being such, it has been a loss only occasioned by the act of the plaintiffs themselves—they are not entitled to recover, and therefore C a nonsuit must be entered.”

That appears to me to be a distinct authority upon the present case, and, although the attention of the learned counsel at the Bar was called to the case, undoubtedly it has received no answer. Nothing has been said to impugn the doctrine there laid down, nor any distinction pointed out with reference to its just application to the present case. It is also to be observed that there is no case showing under-
D writers entitled to the freight by reason of their having a total loss, except where there has been an abandonment, which I should have expected it would have been thought necessary to produce evidence of in sustaining the present argument. I repeat that there is no case in which the underwriters of a ship have ever been held entitled to the freight, except when there has been an abandonment. I feel bound to state, with every respect to a contrary opinion, that it is clear to my
E mind, that there has been no loss of freight in this case within the meaning of the policy. I, therefore, concur in the opinion that your Lordships are bound, in point of law, to reverse the judgment of the court below.

Appeal allowed.

Estoppel—Estoppel by representation—Representation of existing fact, not statement of intention—Need to prove knowledge of falsity of representation.

If a person makes a false representation to another and that other acts on it the person who has made it will not afterwards be allowed to set up that what he said was false and to assert the truth in place of the falsehood which misled the other. It is not necessary that the person making the representation should know that it was false; no fraud need have been intended. If this party has unwittingly misled the other it must be shown that he did so in such circumstances that he had reasonable ground for supposing that the person whom he was misleading would act on what he was saying. It will not do if he merely said something, supposing it to be right, and some stranger, having heard and acted on it, should afterwards come to him to make it good. But held by LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., and LORD BROUGHAM, LORD ST. LEONARDS dissenting: the doctrine does not apply to a case where the representation is not a representation of fact, but a statement of intention.

Appeal against a decree made by SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., which stood on appeal to the Court of Appeal in Chancery in a cause instituted by the respondent, James William Bayley Money, commonly called in the proceedings William Money, against the appellants, Mr. and Mrs. Jorden, and other parties, praying that a debt of £1,200, secured by a bond and warrant of attorney, might be declared to have been abandoned, and that the appellants might be decreed to release the respondent from the bond, that the warrant of attorney be given up to be cancelled, and that satisfaction be entered up on judgment which had been obtained against the respondent, or else that it might be declared that this was a partnership transaction arising upon this bond, and that the respondent was liable only for a portion of the bond debt. C D

Mrs. Jorden, then Miss Marnell, in the earlier period of her life lived in India with her two brothers, one of them Richard Marnell, a barrister, at Calcutta, and the other, Charles Browne Marnell, a solicitor there. Mr. Money, the father of the respondent, was also a barrister at Calcutta, and he had obtained the office of Master of the Supreme Court, which is a very lucrative office and a high station. He was on friendly terms with Miss Marnell and her brothers, and he settled on her certain property, then called the Midnapore property, described variously as of the value of £120 a year and as worth only about £70 a year, but probably something between both. Richard Marnell died in India, and upon his death Miss Marnell returned to England. Charles Marnell, the solicitor, also returned. Charles died in January, 1843, leaving Miss Marnell his sole executrix and residuary legatee. At the time of his death, Charles held the bond in question for £1,200, and a warrant of attorney as security for the same sum, both of them having been executed by the respondent, Money, as security for money advanced to him by Charles to finance a commercial speculation. As executrix, Miss Marnell became entitled to the bond in question, if it were a valid bond and capable of being enforced. E F G

The respondent, however, alleged that from the time of Charles Marnell's death, and even before the death actually occurred, Miss Marnell had repeatedly declared, and sometimes in the most solemn manner, to the respondent's father, to the respondent himself, and to numerous other persons, that she had abandoned and never intended to enforce against the respondent the claim which she was entitled to make, as her brother's representative, for the debt of £1,200, originally secured by the bond, assigning, as her reasons, that she had never considered the respondent liable, in honour or justice, for more than his proportionate share of that sum, and that she was determined to relinquish that share by way of return for the benefits which she had derived from the respondent's father. Messrs. Manning and Dalston acted as her solicitors in all the affairs relating to the probate of her brother's will and the administration of his estate. Probate duty was originally paid upon the sum of £2,000, under which the estate was sworn in the first instance; afterwards this was increased to £4,000, upon an affidavit sworn by Miss Marnell. The debt of £1,200 due upon the bond was not included in the sum of £2,000, under which the probate was first taken out, or in the increased amount of £4,000, or in the residuary account, and no application for payment of any part of this debt was ever made while Miss Marnell continued unmarried. H I

- A The respondent left the army in 1843, and in 1845 he became engaged to be married to Miss Eleanor Poore, daughter of Sir Edward Poore, of Cuffnells, near Lyndhurst. The respondent, having no property of his own and being dependant upon his profession and on what he might receive from his father after his decease, it was at first arranged that his marriage should be postponed for two years. He informed his intended wife, and Lady Poore, of the circumstances under which
- B he had become liable for the debt of £1,200, and of the kindness of Miss Marnell to him in promising not to enforce that liability. Immediately on his engagement being formed, he wrote her a letter informing her of his intended marriage, and also stating that he had told both Lady Poore and Miss Poore of "all her various kindnesses to him". During the negotiations and arrangements which took place after the date of this letter with a view to the solemnisation of the
- C marriage and to the execution of a settlement thereon, it was considered necessary, both by the respondent and his family, and by Lady Poore, on behalf of her daughter, that the respondent should be made secure against any future demand for payment of the debt of £1,200. Conversations took place with Miss Marnell which were spoken to by various witnesses examined on behalf of the respondent, and these witnesses said that she would not use the bond against the respondent.
- D The respondent said that his marriage, which took place in August, 1845, was contracted on the faith of these representations.

- Miss Marnell having married, she and her husband brought an action against the respondent to recover the £1,200 on the bond and warrant of attorney. Judgment was given in their favour, but it was not executed, and the respondent filed his bill in the present suit. To his claim the appellants put in an answer denying
- E in positive terms that there had been any abandonment of the debt, or any contract to abandon it. The cause was heard before the Master of the Rolls, who, on Feb. 9, 1852, granted an injunction to restrain the appellants from enforcing the judgment on the warrant of attorney. The case was taken by appeal before the lords justices, who, on May 29, 1852, delivered judgment. Their Lordships differed in opinion. KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., concurred with the Master of the Rolls, and LORD CRANWORTH, L.J., thought that the order of his Honour must be reversed: 2 De G.M. & G. 318. The order made at the Rolls continued, therefore, to stand, and this appeal was then brought.
- F

Rolt and Willcock (White was with them) for the appellants.

Roundell Palmer and Bates for the respondent.

- G LORD CRANWORTH, L.C. (who stated that, though for convenience sake he should speak only of the bond, his observations must be taken to apply equally to the warrant of attorney): The first question we have to consider is whether the bond was a valid security, because though it has not been actually argued that it was not, yet a good deal of discussion took place upon the question of this bond
- H with a view to show that the respondent had been induced by Charles Marnell improperly to execute it, and that, in truth he ought never to have been liable for the sum for which it was given. On that point not much reliance was placed, but I ought, perhaps, to say that I do not entertain a doubt that, at all events for the purpose of this suit, it must be treated as a valid bond.

- I The transaction which gave rise to the bond was unquestionably one of a very doubtful character, but, however hard the terms on which the money was obtained might be, they were perfectly lawful terms, which the parties being all sui juris, and upon an equal footing, could accept or refuse. I may stipulate what I choose, though I cannot thereby absolve myself from liability to third persons. I may stipulate with another, if I like to do so and he likes to agree, that I will advance £1,200 upon a speculation upon the terms, that at all events he is to pay me £1,200 with interest; that, if there is profit, I am to have a share of that profit, and, if there is a loss, he is to bear the loss; or upon any other terms between ourselves for which we may choose to stipulate. I do not inquire into the relations of these persons as between themselves and third parties. However, whatever the terms were, the bond the warrant of attorney were given, and being given, the respondent thinks that there is something afterwards to affect his liability to Charles Marnell as to the payment of the £1,200. I had occasion, being one of the lords justices when the case was considered upon appeal, to look into the matter very attentively, and I have again done so on this occasion. Whatever defects there may be in my judicial character, the being too confident in my own opinion is not one of them, perhaps the reverse; but having again examined the matter, I cannot arrive at any conclusion different from that at which I arrived when the case was before me in the court below.

There are two grounds upon which it is said that the parties have lost their right to enforce the bond. The one is, that previously to William Money's marriage, Mrs. Jorden, then Miss Marnell, represented that the bond had been abandoned, that she had given up her right upon it, and upon the faith of that representation the marriage was contracted. Then it is said that upon a principle well known in the law, founded upon good faith and equity, a principle equally of law and of equity, if a person makes a false representation to another and that other acts upon that false representation, the person who has made it shall not afterwards be allowed to set up that what he said was false and to assert the real truth in place of the falsehood which has so misled the other. That is a principle of universal application, and has been particularly applied to cases where representations have been made as to the state of the property of persons about to contract marriage, and where, upon the faith of such representations, marriage has been contracted. There the person who has made the false representations has in a great many cases been held bound to make his representations good.

A leading case, Neville v. Wilkinson (1), upon that subject, which has been referred to, came before LORD THURLOW. In that case, Mr. Neville, the son of Lord Abergavenny, was in treaty for a marriage with the daughter of a very rich person, a gentleman of the name of Robinson. The father of the young lady, it seems, was anxious as to the property, knowing that Mr. Neville, the intended husband, was a young man of expensive habits, and that he was involved in considerable debts, and Mr. Neville, in order to quiet Mr. Robinson's mind, induced Wilkinson, the defendant, who was his principal agent, to make out a schedule, and to state it to be a schedule of all the debts to which Mr. Neville was liable. Mr. Wilkinson did so, and he represented that a sum of £18,000 was the amount of all Mr. Neville's debts, concealing, at the instance of Mr. Neville, from Mr. Robinson, the fact that besides the £18,000, Mr. Neville was really indebted to Wilkinson himself, and another person, in a further sum of nearly £8,000, making £26,000, instead of £18,000. Upon that representation the marriage took place, and provision was made for the payment of the £18,000 debts; Mr. Robinson thought that his daughter was marrying a person who was free from debt. Afterwards Mr. Wilkinson sought to enforce his own claim of £8,000, and LORD THURLOW said that he could not do that; he had represented that there was not any sum of £8,000 due to him, and upon the faith of that representation the marriage had been contracted, and he could not be suffered to say that that which he had thus represented was a falsehood, and now to proceed upon the truth.

That was, in truth, a decision which was exactly in conformity with what had been previously decided by LORD MANSFIELD, in Montefiori v. Montefiori (2). In that case Joseph Montefiori, being about to contract marriage, induced his brother Moses to give him a note for a large sum of money, as the balance of accounts between them, which balance Moses acknowledged to have in his hands, though, in truth, no such balance, or anything like it, existed. The marriage took place upon the faith of that representation. Moses afterwards sought to get back the note, and the matter was referred to arbitration. The arbitrators awarded the note to be given up, but the matter was brought before the Court of King's Bench, and LORD MANSFIELD said (1 Wm. Bl. at p. 364):

A "It shall be as represented to be. . . . No man shall set up his own iniquity as a defence, any more than as a cause of action."

B There had been a much earlier case of Gale v. Lindo (3), where, just in the same way, a person, in order to make it appear that his sister had a fortune of £500, whereas, in truth, she only had £350, gave her a sum of £150, so as to make up the £500, and she gave him a bond for the amount. After the marriage had taken place upon the faith of that it was held that the bond could not be enforced, and it was ordered to be delivered up to be cancelled.

C These principles are plainly and perfectly intelligible, and quite consistent with good sense, and I should be in the last degree sorry that any opinion or decision to which I am a party, should lead to a notion that I, in the slightest degree, question their propriety. Nay, more, I think that the principle has been carried, and may be carried, much further, because I think it is not necessary that the party making the representation should know that it was false; no fraud need have been intended at the time. But if the party has unwittingly misled another, you must add that he has misled another under such circumstances that he had reasonable ground for supposing that the person whom he was misleading was to act upon what he was saying. It will not do if he merely said something, supposing it to be quite right, and that some stranger, having heard and acted upon it, should afterwards come to him to make it good.

E The whole doctrine was very much considered at law, for it is a doctrine not confined to cases in equity, but one that prevails at law also; and there are, in fact, more cases upon the subject at law than in equity. It was much considered in Freeman v. Cooke (4). There had been a previous case in the Court of Queen's Bench, of Pickard v. Sears (5), in which the doctrine had also prevailed. I shall shortly refer your Lordships to what fell from PARKE, B., who, after great consideration among all the judges of the Court of Exchequer (to which I can speak from personal knowledge), delivered judgment in Freeman v. Cooke (4). I need not refer to the particular facts in that case. It was a case where, upon the sheriff seizing goods, a party made certain representations as to the ownership of them, and the question was whether he was estopped from disputing the truth of what he had so said. PARKE, B., says (2 Exch. at pp. 662, 663):

G "The estoppel, therefore, if it be one, created by the conduct of the bankrupt in this case, is not opened by the omission to plead it, and the only question is, whether it be an estoppel? It is contended that it was upon the authority of the rule laid down in Pickard v. Sears (5). That rule is, 'that where one by his words or conduct wilfully causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief, or to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time.' That was founded on previous authorities in the cases Graves v. Key (6), Heane v. Rogers (7), and has been acted upon in some cases since. The principle is stated more broadly by LORD DENMAN, in the case of Gregg v. Wells (8), where his Lordship says that a party who negligently or culpably stands by and allows another to contract on the faith of a fact which he can contradict, cannot afterwards dispute that fact in an action against the person whom he has himself assisted in deceiving."

I I must beg leave, by the way, to say that I think that this is stated a little too broadly. PARKE, B., continues (ibid. at p. 663):

"Whether that rule has been correctly acted upon by the jury, in all the reported cases in which it has been applied, is not now the question; but the proposition contained in the rule itself, as above laid down in the case of Pickard v. Sears (5), must be considered as established. By the term 'wilfully,' however, in that rule, we must understand, if not that the party represents that to be true which he knows to be untrue, at least that he means his representation to be acted upon, and that it is acted upon accordingly; and if, whatever a man's real intention may be, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe that it was meant that he should act upon it, and did act upon it as true, the party making the representation would be equally precluded from contesting its truth."

I believe that the rule of law, which, as I have more than once said, is a rule founded upon perfectly good sense and is intelligible to every capacity, is illustrated by what then fell from PARKE, B., as well and as accurately as in any of the cases upon the subject. The question is whether the evidence here shows that anything took place which brings the case within those authorities. I am clearly of opinion, as clearly as I can be, knowing that I am counter in this respect, certainly, to an authority for which I feel very great deference, namely, the Master of the Rolls, probably to the lords justices, and I have some reason to suppose, also to some at least of your Lordships, that it does not. I think that that doctrine does not apply to a case where the representation is not a representation of a fact, but a statement of something which the party intends or does not intend to do. In the former case it is a contract, in the latter it is not. What is here contended for is that Mrs. Jorden, then Miss Marnell, over and over again represented that she abandoned the debt. Clothe that in any words you please, it means no more than that she would never enforce the debt; she does not mean, in saying that she had abandoned it, to say that she had executed a release of the debt so as to preclude her legal right to sue. All that she could mean was that she positively promised that she never would enforce it. My opinion is that if all the evidence had come up to the mark, which, for reasons I shall presently state, I do not think it did, if upon the very eve of the marriage she had said, "William Money, I never will enforce the bond against you," that would not bring it within these cases. It might be, if all statutable requisites, so far as there are statutable requisites, had been complied with, that it would have been a very good contract whereby she might have bound herself not to enforce the payment. That, however, is not the way in which it is put here; in short, it could not have been, because it must have been a contract reduced into writing and signed. This case is put entirely upon the ground of representation. I think that the not adhering to this statement, call it contract or call it representation, is no more a fraud than it would be not adhering to her engagement, if she had said: "Mr. William Money, you may marry; do not be in fear, you will not be in want; I promise to settle £10,000 consols upon you." If she did not perform that promise, she would be guilty of a breach of contract in respect of which she might be sued, if it were put into a valid form, but not otherwise; so if she had said, as she did to William Money: "I mean to give you everything I am worth in the world; I promise to do so," her not doing so is no fraud in the sense in which these cases speak of fraud; it is no misrepresentation of a fact which the party is afterwards held bound to make good as true. It seems to me that the distinction is founded upon perfectly good sense, and that in truth in the case of what is something future, there is no reason for the application of the rule, because the parties have only to say: "Enter into a contract," and then all difficulty is removed. It appears to me, therefore, that this, which is the ground upon which the Master of the Rolls proceeded, and upon which he thought that the respondent Money had the right to restrain the appellants from enforcing this bond, fails, for the reasons which I have stated.

There was another ground, however, upon which it was suggested by Mr. Money, and strongly argued, that he was entitled to relief, and upon this ground my then learned colleague, KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., decided in favour of the respondent. It was said that the Midnapore property, which was settled by Mr. Money, the father, upon Miss Marnell, then in India, was a mere gift, a mere voluntary settlement, a settlement, therefore, which it was competent to Mr. Money, the settlor, to

A defeat by parting with it for a valuable consideration to another; that Mr. Money, the father, when his son was about to marry, had an interview with Mrs. Jordan (this is the allegation); that, as the result of that interview, he agreed with her that he would never exercise the power of revoking the Midnapore settlement, in consideration of her engaging never to enforce the bond; and that, that agreement having been entered into, upon the faith of it the parties married. Mr. Money has certainly, if such an agreement was entered into, performed his part of it, for he has since died without ever attempting to exercise that power of revoking the gift of the Midnapore property.

[His LORDSHIP then examined the evidence, and concluded:] It appears to me, upon the grounds I have stated, first, that there is nothing within the meaning of the authorities or on principle to make this a representation by which Mr. and Mrs. Jordan are to be bound. I think further, that the second ground, and that on which the lords justices wholly or mainly proceeded, namely, the existence of a valid contract as to the Midnapore property, has not been made out by evidence upon which your Lordships can safely act, and, consequently, that there has been nothing established which impeaches the right of Mrs. Jordan, as the representative of her brother, to enforce this bond. I do believe that she often and often told this young man that she would leave him all her property and that she would never enforce this bond; I believe she said this over and over again, knowing that it would come to his ears, but that was all that was said either expressly or impliedly, and said with the qualification, "I will not give up my right to the bond; you must trust to my honour." That is the way in which I interpret what she has said from time to time, and, that being so, however discreditable or dishonourable it may be, having so spoken, to recede from it, it appears to me that that is a ground upon which your Lordships cannot safely act, and that, consequently, there was no valid foundation for this bill, which I think, therefore, ought to have been dismissed.

LORD BROUGHAM.—This case has given me, as I believe it has the rest of your Lordships, no small anxiety in the course of the argument, and subsequently in considering its details before coming to a decision, for there are a great many facts and a very considerable number of matters not easily reconcilable one with the other, and no little obscurity hanging over parts of the case even after all attempts shall be made to reconcile and to explain the darker passages. But there is also another circumstance which has given me very considerable anxiety, and that is the manner in which it was disposed of in the court below. For, first, we have the judgment of a most learned and able judge, the Master of the Rolls; then an appeal from that decree to the Court of Appeal in Chancery; and then the two learned lords justices, differing upon the subject; so that, in reality, there cannot so much be said to have been a decision of the Court of Appeal, from which this case comes to your Lordships, as that in consequence of the difference of opinion between the learned judges, before whom the decree of the Master of the Rolls was brought by appeal, there could be no decision, and that, therefore, of necessity, the decree of the Master of the Rolls stood.

If I found, upon examining the reasons of that learned and most able judge, for whom I entertain the greatest respect, that upon the question of fact that learned judge entertained one clear opinion, and that by the lords justices differing, it was sanctioned by the concurrence of one of those learned judges, I should certainly feel slow to disturb that judgment when brought before your Lordships by appeal. But upon examining the decree of the Master of the Rolls, and the reasons which he gave, I do not find that he proceeds upon the same ground as that upon which KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., proceeded when he differed from my noble and learned friend; and I do not find that there was that difference of opinion upon the matters of fact in the case between the learned Master of the Rolls and my noble and learned friend, one of the lords justices, in the Court of Appeal below. The Master of the Rolls proceeded upon the ground of there having been such a misrepresentation by Louisa Marnell, afterwards Mrs. Jorden, as brought the case within the authorities which have been referred to, beginning with Gale v. Lindo (8), and followed by Neville v. Wilkinson (1), and Montefiori v. Montefiori (2). I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend that this is not a case of that kind. For example, in Gale v. Lindo (8) the ground is stated to have been a misrepresentation of a material fact, giving rise to what had taken place. A

The Lord Chancellor (who must have been LORD JEFFREYS at that time, October, 1687), said: "That which was once a fraud will always be a fraud," and so acted upon that principle on the ground of preventing or frustrating a fraud. B

In like manner take Montefiori v. Montefiori (2). There a man had stated that he owed his brother a sum of money upon the balance of partnership accounts, and gave a note for that amount to be shown to the friends of the lady whom the brother was about to marry, upon which a marriage took place shortly afterwards. C The rule for the attachment was discharged upon the ground of misrepresentation of a fact, and LORD MANSFIELD said (1 Wm. Bl. at p. 364):

"The law is, that where, upon proposals of marriage, third persons represent anything material in a light different from the truth, even though it be by collusion with the husband, they shall be bound to make good the thing in the manner in which they represented it." D

So, in Neville v. Wilkinson (1), the plaintiff had stated his apprehension that the disclosure of the whole truth as to his debts, would prevent his marriage, and he induced the defendant, in making out a list of his debts, to omit from that list the amount which was due to himself. He was, after the marriage, on a bill filed for the purpose, restrained by injunction from proceeding to recover the amount upon the ground of his own representation. And LORD ELDON, in speaking of that case, in Vauxhall Bridge Co. v. Earl of Spencer (9), says he remembers arguing Neville v. Wilkinson (1) before LORD THURLOW, but LORD THURLOW thought that the defendant, E

"having made a representation, a court of equity must hold him to it, and that although the plaintiff was particeps criminis." F

In all those cases, therefore, there was a misrepresentation of the facts, and the learned Master of the Rolls appears to consider that in this case there was a similar misrepresentation. In my opinion, there was a representation by Louisa Marnell of an intention as to her will and a promise was made by her, but of misrepresentation of fact there was none. She simply stated what was her intention; she did not misrepresent her intention; and I have no manner of doubt that, at the time she made that statement, she had the intention which it is stated she professed, of never putting William Bailey Money in trouble, by proceeding upon the bond. G

[HIS LORDSHIP then referred to the evidence; said that, he had, after very considerable doubt upon some parts of the case, but after fully viewing the whole particulars, and examining those statements and those depositions, come to the conclusion that there was not an abandonment of the debt, by Mrs. Jorden—not only that there was no abandonment, but that there was rather a refusal of abandonment when one came to examine in what sense and with what intent the word "abandonment" has been used; and concluded:] Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion, after very great consideration of the facts, that the decree of the Master of the Rolls cannot be sustained. H

LORD ST. LEONARDS.—It is my misfortune on this occasion to differ from both my noble and learned friends on the facts as well as on the law applicable to those facts. I

[HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence in detail, and continued:] I think I have shown your Lordships, from the evidence and from the facts, that the debt was abandoned, as far as it could be abandoned, both from affection and from the circumstances connected with the two families, for a valid consideration, namely, the intended marriage, and for a further valuable consideration (if that were necessary),

A namely, the abandonment of, or the non-execution of, the right of the respondent's father to defeat the gift of the Midnapore property. Then, what is the effect of that in point of law? As I understand the way in which it is put by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, it is this, and I am trying to see whether my view of it can be considered as in any way an answer to it. My noble and learned friend has made use of a form of expression that the whole question here

B turns on this, that in point of law, in order to avail yourself of any statement in a case like the present, it must be a misrepresentation of the facts, and not a declaration of what you intend to do or intend to omit to do. It is my misfortune not to agree in that view of the matter. I do not consider that that can be the case. I think it is utterly immaterial whether it is a misrepresentation of fact as it actually existed, or a misrepresentation of an intention to do, or to abstain

C from doing, an act which would lead to the damage of the party whom you thereby induced to deal in marriage or in purchase, or in anything of that sort, upon the faith of that representation. It is admitted that if she had said: "I have cancelled the bond, or have destroyed it, or burnt it," and she had not done so, then the respondent must necessarily have succeeded in a court of equity, but it is said that if she states: "I have got the bond, but you may safely rely upon it that I

D never intend to use it," that is not a misrepresentation of a fact, but only the declaration of an intention.

What is the principle upon which the cases have proceeded? The principle is simply that you shall not be allowed, either in a court of equity or in a court of law, to misrepresent the state of circumstances in which property exists, so as to deceive parties and induce them to rely upon your statement, and to deal with

E matters of the utmost importance, for example, as in this case, with a marriage settlement, or in the purchase of property, which is a very common case. If, therefore, I either say that I have abandoned a security, or that I never will enforce that security, and a third party is induced to enter into marriage upon the faith of that statement, although it may have been unwise (as in this case it was) that the party did not insist upon a release in order to make the thing quite regular

F and right, yet surely it is not meant to be argued—it is not, I think, arguable—that that party can afterwards enforce that right after an act has been done upon the faith of that declaration—an act which cannot be undone as to the party whom he has induced so to act. The whole current of authorities is the other way.

Take it on the Midnapore property, and let us see how it stands. George Money says: "You have got a bond against my son; it may at this moment not be binding, G but he is about to be married; now, therefore, come to a determination, for the settlement will depend upon your determination. I have a right to affect your title, or to load your title to Midnapore with a heavy liability, and I can do that in favour of my son. I will not enforce my right if you choose not to enforce yours; that is agreed to, and that is a mutual promise." Can either party retire from that promise?

H Take the case which was decided a century and a half ago, and has been several times decided since, and is not disputed in law, namely, where a man makes his will and gives to a devisee all his property. He then tells the devisee that he is about to alter his will because he wants to give legacies to other persons, and the devisee says to him (there being nothing in writing): "If you will abstain from revoking your will, I promise you that the legacies shall be paid"; and the man

I abstains from revoking his will. It is perfectly settled law that in such a case the devisee, having made the promise, is bound by it. Yet that is not a misrepresentation of a fact; it is a declaration of an intention and a promise to do a thing in consequence of which a threat is not acted on, and a court of equity has over and over again enforced the right thereby created, and nobody disputes the authority to enforce it. How is that distinguishable from this case? Mr. Money says: "If you will not enforce that bond, I will not enforce my right; I will not, if you will not; if you will, I will." In the other case, the testator says: "If you will pay the legacies which I wish to give, there is no need of a codicil." In either case it rests on a mere promise. The Statute of Frauds, about which something has been said, does not operate as any bar to the enforcement of the right by those who would have been legatees of a testator against the man who became devisee under the circumstances I have stated; and as a lawyer I am at a loss to distinguish that case from this in point of principle. A

As regards the authorities on this subject the question is whether I can find a case with the facts just the same as those of this case? My noble and learned friend said that the cases to which he referred were cases where there was a misrepresentation of a fact, and that, therefore, they do not form a precedent for this case. But the question is: What is the principle involved in these cases? Certainly I should recommend your Lordships to consider that principle as extending to this case. Let us hear how the principle is put in Montefiori v. Montefiori (2). LORD MANSFIELD there lays down the principle thus (1 Wm. Bl. at p. 384): B

"The law is, that where upon proposals of marriage third persons represent anything material in a light different from the truth, even though it be by collusion with the husband, they shall be bound to make good the thing in the manner in which they represented it. It shall be as represented to be." C

The other judges concurred. It may be said again that that is representing something in a light different from the truth. Is it not different from the truth to represent that you have abandoned a thing; that you never will attempt to enforce it; and then subsequently to come forward and say you have not abandoned it, and never did, and that you are going to enforce the right, even to the extreme of throwing into jail the man who is so much the object of your affection? I can, no doubt, distinguish, in point of fact, the one case from the other, but not in point of principle. The principle is the same in both. She is asked: "Have you abandoned it?" (an abandonment is perfectly good as a consideration for marriage.) She now says that she had not abandoned it, and never did. She stated that as a fact, which was a misrepresentation, for that she said she had abandoned it is a fact which is proved beyond all doubt. Therefore, if a misrepresentation of fact were necessary, she has misrepresented a fact, for she stated over and over again, not only that she intended to abandon it, but that she had abandoned it, and now she says that she had not abandoned and never said she had abandoned it. D E F

Independently of that, your Lordships are asked to consider that a representation of an intention is not a binding act, and that you cannot misrepresent what you intend to do. But if you declare your intention with reference, for example, to a marriage, not to enforce a given right, and the marriage takes place on that declaration, I submit that, in point of law, that is a binding undertaking. In Neville v. Wilkinson (1), LORD THURLOW refers to the language, and adopts, after some hesitation, the very rule of LORD MANSFIELD, which goes to the real principle of the case. G

There is a case in VINER'S ABRIDGEMENT, tit. Contract and Agreement, 523, pl. 40, of this nature: H

"The bill here was to have a lease according to the defendant's promise, plaintiff having laid out money in the premises; and the defendant insists on the statute, there being no agreement in writing, nor any certain terms agreed upon, and says what plaintiff laid out was not on lasting improvements, but admits plaintiff built a stable, which cost him about £10. It was proved that defendant told the plaintiff his word was as good as his bond, and promised the plaintiff a lease when he should have renewed his own from his landlord. The Lord Chancellor said that the defendant is guilty of a fraud, and ought to be punished for it, and so decreed a lease to the plaintiff; though the terms were uncertain, it is in the plaintiff's election for what time he will hold it, and he doth elect to hold during the defendant's term, at the old rent, and plaintiff to pay costs." I

To be sure no case was ever carried further than that. The equity was of a trifling nature and the terms not clear, and a court of equity never undertakes to perform,

A or to decree, that which cannot be ascertained, but the defendant had promised and agreed to put the plaintiff in possession of a lease, and declared that "his word was as good as his bond," and the Lord Chancellor held that he was bound by this agreement in connection with the act done (and here the act is much stronger than that which took place there), and that the Statute of Frauds, though pleaded, could not operate in bar.

B There is a case before LORD THURLOW, L.C., of Tawney v. Crowther (10), in which there was an agreement drawn up and not signed, and one party who refused to execute the agreement swore that he refused to sign it because they could not come ultimately to terms. The father of the other party swore that they had come to terms, there were two writings produced of the man promising, and the phrase was, that "his word was as good as his bond," just the same as the words in the last case. LORD THURLOW there ultimately held that the man was bound, although he had not signed the agreement, and there were these circumstances. There was oath against oath, and the answer; but the Lord Chancellor makes this observation (3 Bro.C.C. at p. 320):

D "It has been argued that he declined to sign it. If he had said he would never sign it, he could not have been bound; but if he said he never would sign it, but would make it as good as if he did, it would be a promise to perform it; if he said he never would sign it, because he would not hamper himself by an agreement, it would be too perverse to be admitted; but here I am of opinion that the agreement must be performed."

E There is another case of Cookes v. Mascall (11). In that case it was an oath against the answer, which it was not in the former case. There was an agreement for marriage, or proposals, and it appeared that the proposals seemed to be approved, because the father of the intended husband went with an attorney to the father of the intended wife, and the attorney drew an agreement to be mutually signed, but before it was ready for execution, as Mascall, who was the father of the lady, swore positively, they disagreed, and he refused to proceed and never signed it. F The son's father swore that the articles were read over and agreed to, and that it was arranged that they should meet another time to execute them, so that there was an oath against the answer. The son was permitted to go to Mascall's house, and in December the daughter was married, with her father's approbation. In that case the agreement was enforced against her father. Here was an agreement, therefore. G The parties differed about whether the agreement was ever actually concluded, and there was no witness, but, as the father afterwards received the intended son-in-law and witnessed the marriage, he was held bound by these terms which he had never signed, amounting to a promise to make a settlement, and he was compelled to perform it. That proves, therefore, that the Statute of Frauds in such a case will have no operation, but that the promise to do an act, followed by marriage, which cannot be undone, is equivalent to a binding agreement to do that act.

H There are other cases to the same effect, but I will just refer you to Pickard v. Sears (5), where LORD DENMAN says (6 Ad. & El. at p. 474): :

I "But the rule of law is clear that where one by his words or conduct wilfully causes another to believe the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief, so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time; and the plaintiff in this case might have parted with his interest in the property by verbal gift or sale, without any of those formalities that throw technical obstacles in the way of legal evidence."

That is exactly this case, for, this lady having represented that she had abandoned the bond and would never enforce it against this gentleman who thereupon enters into a marriage treaty, a settlement following upon that, it would be impossible for her, consistently with the principle of that case, afterwards to say that she had not abandoned the bond, but that she would enforce it against him.

That is followed by Gregg v. Wells (8). The Chief Justice there says (10 Ad. & El. at pp. 97, 98), referring to Pickard v. Sears (5):

"The principle of that case may be stated even more broadly than it is there laid down. A party who negligently or culpably stands by and allows another to contract on the faith and understanding of a fact which he can contradict, cannot afterwards dispute that fact in an action against the person whom he has himself assisted in deceiving."

So that, if this lady had stood by, had made no declaration, but knowing that they believed from the former declaration that that bond never would be enforced, and, acting upon it, they had made a settlement upon that young man for life, and she had afterwards attempted to enforce the payment of her bond as against that property, that declaration would be entirely good and perfect as an answer to such claim. That was followed by a similar case in the Exchequer, Freeman v. Cooke (4).

I submit, therefore, to your Lordships, that in point of law this case clearly comes within the scope of those authorities; and with great submission to my noble and learned friends, with whom it is my misfortune to differ, my apprehension is that the rule of law clearly extends to this case where the facts are made out that she did abandon the bond, that she abandoned it for a pecuniary consideration, that the marriage followed upon her declaration, that the settlement was made and the property vested in this gentleman in consequence of it, and that he never would have become possessed of the property which was settled upon him so as to make it available for paying the debt, if they had not trusted to that declaration of hers. Having promised that she would not enforce it, she is, in my opinion, bound by that promise. The Statute of Frauds does not extend to this case. Looking at the whole of the circumstances, from the beginning of the transaction down to the time of her own marriage, I should, but for the opinions expressed by my noble and learned friends, have thought it a clear case, both in point of law and in point of evidence. Having, for the reasons I have stated, come to the conclusion that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, I should, were it not for the different opinion of my noble and learned friends, have advised your Lordships, upon the weight of evidence as to the facts and upon the rule of law, as I understand it, to adopt the same view. As it is, the decision will be the other way

Appeal allowed.

R. v. EAGLETON

[COURT FOR CONSIDERATION OF CROWN CASES RESERVED (Jervis, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Parke, Alderson, Platt and Martin, BB., Maule, Wightman, Cresswell, Erle, Williams and Crompton, JJ.), December 2, 1854, February 3, July 9, 1855]

[Reported Dears.C.C. 376, 515; 24 L.J.M.C. 158; 26 L.T.O.S. 7; 19 J.P. 546; 1 Jur.N.S. 940; 4 W.R. 17; 3 C.L.R. 1145; 6 Cox, C.C. 559]

Criminal Law—False pretences—Attempt—Fraudulent obtaining of credit for sum due to be paid later—No further step necessary to obtain payment—Subsequent payment liable to deductions.

Criminal Law—Attempt to commit crime—Act immediately connected with offence—Insufficiency of mere intention.

By a contract in writing dated Dec. 22, 1853, the prisoner undertook to supply to the out-door poor of a parish loaves weighing three and a half pounds each at a price of 7d. per loaf. The relieving officer gave to a poor person a ticket which the poor person handed to the prisoner in exchange for a loaf, and the prisoner returned that ticket to the relieving officer who credited him with the sum due for the loaf supplied. Payment was made on a subsequent date specified in the contract, which contained a provision authorising the guardians to make deductions from the money due to the prisoner in the event of any failure by him to perform the terms of the contract. The prisoner was charged with defrauding the guardians by supplying to poor persons loaves which were of less than the contract weight.

Held: when the prisoner obtained credit for the full price in respect of the deficient loaves it was not necessary for him to take any further step to enable him to receive the payment appropriate for loaves of full weight; accordingly, he was guilty of attempting to obtain that payment by false pretences, it being immaterial that the sums due to him under the contract were subject to deductions in certain circumstances.

Per PARKE, B.: The mere intention to commit a misdemeanour is not criminal. Some act is required, but all acts towards committing a misdemeanour are not indictable. Acts remotely leading to the commission of an offence are not to be considered as attempts to commit it, but acts immediately connected with it are, and if in the present case, after the defendant had obtained the credit with the relieving officer for the fraudulent overcharge, any further step on the part of the defendant had been necessary to obtain payment, e.g., the making of a further account, we should have thought that the obtaining credit in account with the relieving officer would not have been sufficiently proximate to the obtaining of the money.

Case Stated by the recorder of Great Yarmouth for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

By a contract in writing dated Dec. 22, 1853, it was provided :

“ . . the said John Eagleton [the prisoner] doth, in consequence of the payment to be made to him as hereinafter mentioned, hereby contract with the said guardians that he the said John Eagleton will henceforth until the 25th day of March next, serve, supply and deliver, or cause to be delivered to the out-door poor, at such times and in such manner as the said board of guardians, etc., shall from time to time direct, such quantities of bread and flour as shall be required, etc., at and after the rates or prices following, that is to say, bread made from the best household flour in loaves of three and a half pounds each, etc., at sevenpence per loaf.” I

A Then followed the agreement by the guardians to pay

"at and after the rates and prices aforesaid, during the said term, for every quantity of the said articles so to be ordered, served, supplied and delivered, and of which a bill of particulars shall be sent with the said articles at the time of the delivery thereof, within two calendar months from the said 25th day of March next."

B The agreement proceeded :

"Provided always, and it is hereby expressly agreed, and particularly by and on the part of the said John Eagleton, that in case such articles shall not be duly served, etc., when and as required by the said board, etc., and when delivered shall not in every respect be of the quality and sort contracted for, or shall be deficient in the weight stated and charged for in such bill of particulars, etc., or if delivered without such bill of particulars, they the said board, etc., shall be at liberty to return the same at the expense of the said John Eagleton. And that in every such case it shall be lawful for the said board, etc., to purchase a fresh supply or employ any other person to supply the said out-door poor with bread and flour, etc. And that in such case the said John Eagleton, his executors and administrators, shall bear and make good all costs, charges and expenses of such additional supply over and above the price at which the same are hereinbefore contracted to be supplied and delivered by the said John Eagleton. And also that it shall be lawful for the said board of guardians to retain and apply any sum of money which may be due to the said John Eagleton under and by virtue of this agreement at the time of such failure in the performance thereof to the payment of such loss, costs, damages and expenses as the said board may incur or be put to by reason thereof."

The poor person on presenting the ticket to the defendant was entitled to receive a loaf. Twenty of these tickets were given on Saturday, Jan. 21, 1855, to as many out-door poor by the relieving officer, and the poor persons on presenting them to the defendant received the number of loaves mentioned in the ticket. By the course of dealing the defendant would return the tickets on the following week with a statement in writing of the number of loaves he had supplied, and the relieving officer would credit the defendant in his books with the amount. The money would then be paid to him at the time stipulated in the contract. The tickets in question were returned by the defendant to the relieving officer with the note of the number of loaves and the defendant had credit accordingly. The defendant was charged G that he unlawfully and fraudulently and with intent to cheat the guardians supplied to fifty poor persons loaves which were deficient in weight, and then represented to the guardians that the loaves so supplied by him were of the contract weight, whereby he was credited by the relieving officer with the contract price of the loaves. It was objected on the part of the defendant that the evidence did not support any of the first seven counts in the indictment, which were for fraud, nor H the last three which charged an attempt to obtain money by false pretences. The jury found that the loaves of bread furnished by the defendant were deficient in weight and were so with the knowledge of the defendant; that he intended thereby to defraud the out-door poor for whose relief they had been ordered; and that in returning the tickets to the relieving officer he intended to represent that he had delivered the loaves mentioned on them of the weight stated in the contract, and I they returned a verdict of Guilty. The learned recorder requested the opinion of the court upon the objections taken on the part of the defendant.

Bulwer for the prosecution.

Bodkin, J. Clerk and H. Mills for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 9, 1855. PARKE, B., read the following judgment of the court.—It has been contended by counsel for the prisoner that the indictment for attempting to obtain money by false pretences could not be supported because the offence of obtaining money under false pretences was committed only where the money was obtained wholly without consideration, and the offence was analogous to larceny, of which the prisoner might, by the Larceny Act, 1827 [repealed by the Criminal Statutes Repeal Act, 1861], s. 53, be convicted in case the offence should appear on the trial to be larceny. There are many cases, as is mentioned in that section, in which the distinction is very subtle between the misdemeanour of obtaining money under false pretences and the offence of larceny, and it was very proper to make that provision in the statute, but it does not follow that all the cases of obtaining money by false pretences are of that description. It was strongly contended that the statute against obtaining money by false pretences applies to no cases where there is some bargain or consideration for giving the money and so some cause for the giving of it other than the false pretence, as where goods were sold under a false representation of the quality or value, and the purchaser had the commodity, for otherwise the range of indictable offences would be greatly extended, and breaches of contract made the ground of criminal proceedings. If this had been the case of a sale of bread to the prosecutors with a false representation of the weight and an attempt thereby to receive a larger price than was really due, we should have had to decide whether an indictable offence had been thereby committed, and should have had to consider R. v. Kenrick (1), which was the case of a sale of horses by means of a false representation of their being the property of a private gentleman and quiet to ride and drive, and also R. v. Abbott (2), decided upon the authority of R. v. Kenrick (1). In all these cases the prosecutor did not part with his money merely on account of the false pretence, but principally because he had a consideration for it in the property vested in him by the contract. This is not the case of a sale of goods by a false pretence of their weight; it is an attempt to obtain money by the false and fraudulent representation of an antecedent fact, viz., that a greater number of pounds of bread had been delivered than had been actually delivered, that representation being made with a view of obtaining as many sums of twopence as the number of loaves falsely pretended to have been furnished amounted to. In this respect the present case exactly resembles that of R. v. Wittchell (3), where the prisoner obtained money by the false pretence that certain workmen whom it was his duty to pay had earned more than they really had; and since then, there are other cases of similar convictions where the prisoner falsely stated the quantity of work which he had done, according to which he was to be paid. We, therefore, think that those counts in the indictment which charged obtaining money by false pretences would be maintainable if the money had been obtained.

A second objection was, that the defendant was not to obtain the price of the number of pounds, falsely stated to have been delivered, in cash, but only to have credit in account. The statement of the learned recorder is that the defendant was to return the tickets given to the paupers by the relieving officers, and by the paupers delivered to the defendant on receiving the loaves, and that upon such return he would be credited in the relieving officer's book for the amounts, and the money would be paid at the time stipulated in the contract, that is, in two calendar months from Mar. 25 following. No further step would be necessary for the defendant to receive payment. The defendant did obtain credit in account from the relieving officer, in effect, for the amount of the number of pounds falsely represented to have been delivered. Further, the contract with the board of guardians stipulates that, if the defendant should fail in his performance of it, the board of guardians might deduct the damage and costs sustained thereby from the sums payable to him for loaves supplied. On the part of the defendant, his learned counsel contended (i) that the attempt to obtain credit in account for a sum of money by delivering up the tickets as vouchers was not in itself an attempt to obtain money within the meaning of the statute, for that credit in account was not equivalent to money. No doubt the credit in the relieving officer's book was not equivalent to money, and the defendant could not have been convicted of the offence of actually obtaining money by false pretences. Secondly, he contended

- A that the credit in account would not necessarily lead to an ultimate payment, for there might be deductions for breaches of contract which would prevent any payments in cash by the guardians. We have had great doubt on this part of the case, but do not think that this objection should prevail. We think that the contingency of the whole sum due to him being subject to deductions in a future event does not the less make the obtaining credit an attempt to obtain money, if it would be so
- B without that contingency.

Our doubt has been whether the obtaining that credit, though undoubtedly a necessary step towards obtaining the money, can be deemed an attempt to do so. The mere intention to commit a misdemeanour is not criminal—some act is required; and we do not think that all acts towards committing a misdemeanour are indictable. Acts remotely leading towards the commission of the offence are

- C not to be considered as attempts to commit it, but acts immediately connected with it are, and if in this case, after the defendant had obtained the credit with the relieving officer for the fraudulent overcharge, any further step on the part of the defendant had been necessary to obtain payment, as the making out a further account, or producing the vouchers to the board, we should have thought that the obtaining credit in account with the relieving officer would not have been sufficiently
- D proximate to the obtaining of the money. But on the statement in this Case no other act on the part of the defendant would have been required. It was the last act depending on himself towards the payment of the money, and, therefore, it ought to be considered as an attempt.

- The receipt of the money appears to have been prevented by a discovery of the fraud by the relieving officer, and it is very much the same case as if, supposing
- E rendering an account to the guardians at their office with the vouchers annexed were a preliminary necessary step to receiving the money, the defendant had gone to the office, rendered the account and vouchers, and then been discovered, and the money consequently refused.

Conviction of an attempt affirmed.

LUMLEY v. WAGNER

[LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Lord St. Leonards, L.C.), May 22, 26, 1852]

[Reported 1 De G.M. & G. 604; 21 L.J.Ch. 898; 19 L.T.O.S. 264;

Injunction—Contract for personal service—Undertaking not to serve any third person—Jurisdiction to grant injunction to restrain breach of undertaking—Effect to compel specific performance of contract.

The court will grant an injunction to restrain the breach of the negative part of a contract even though it cannot specifically enforce the performance of the positive part of the contract, e.g., where the positive part is an undertaking to render personal services, and the effect of the injunction is to compel the specific performance of the contract as a whole.

By a contract in writing W. bound herself to sing for three months at the plaintiff's theatre and "not to use her talents" at any other theatre.

Held: the court had jurisdiction to grant an injunction to restrain W. from appearing at a theatre other than that of the plaintiff.

Injunction—Damages—Plaintiff's right to recover damages—Jurisdiction to grant injunction.

Per LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C.—It is no objection to the exercise of the jurisdiction by injunction that the plaintiff may have a legal remedy [i.e., a right to recover damages].

Bill filed on April 22, 1852, by the plaintiff, Benjamin Lumley, lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre, London, praying that the defendants, Johanna Wagner, Albert Wagner, her father, and Frederick Gye, lessee of Covent Garden Theatre, might be restrained from committing any breach of an agreement dated Nov. 9, 1851.

The agreement provided:

"The undersigned Mr. Benjamin Lumley, possessor of Her Majesty's Theatre at London, and of the Italian Opera at Paris, of the one part, and Mademoiselle Johanna Wagner, cantatrice of the court of His Majesty the King of Prussia, with the consent of her father, Mr. A. Wagner, residing at Berlin, of the other part, have concerted and concluded the following contract.—First, Mademoiselle Johanna Wagner binds herself to sing for three months at the theatre of Mr. Lumley, Her Majesty's, London, to date from April 1, 1852 (the time necessary for the journey comprised therein) and to give the parts following, 1st, Romeo, Montecchi; 2nd, Fides, Prophète; 3rd, Valentine, Huguenots; 4th, Anna, Don Juan; 5th, Alice, Robert le Diable; 6th, an opera chosen by common accord. Second, the three first parts must necessarily be, 1st, Romeo, 2nd, Fides, 3rd, Valentine; these parts once sung, and then only she will appear, if Mr. Lumley desires it, in the three other operas mentioned aforesaid. Third, these six parts belong exclusively to Mademoiselle Wagner, and any other cantatrice shall not presume to sing them during the three months of her engagement. If Mr. Lumley happens to be prevented, by any cause soever, from giving these operas, he is nevertheless held to pay Mademoiselle Johanna Wagner the salary stipulated lower down for the number of her parts as if she had sung them. Fourth, in the case where Mademoiselle Wagner should be prevented by reason of illness from singing in the course of a month as often as it has been stipulated, Mr. Lumley is bound to pay the salary only for the parts sung. Fifth, Mademoiselle Johanna Wagner binds herself to sing twice a week during the run of the three months; however, if she herself was hindered from singing twice in any week whatever, she will have the right to give at a later period the omitted representation. Sixth, if Mademoiselle Wagner, fulfilling the wishes of the Direction, consent to sing more than twice a week in the course of three months, this last will give to Mademoiselle Wagner £50 sterling for each representation extra. Seventh, Mr. Lumley engages to pay Mademoiselle Wagner a salary of £400 sterling per month, and payment will take place in such manner that she will receive £100 sterling each week. Eighth, Mr. Lumley will pay by letters of exchange to Mademoiselle Wagner at Berlin, Mar. 15, 1852, the sum of £300 sterling, a sum which will be deducted from her engagement in his retaining £100 each month. Ninth, in all cases, except that where a verified illness would place upon her a hindrance, if Mademoiselle Wagner shall not arrive in London eight days after that from whence dates her engagement, Mr. Lumley will have the right to regard the non-appearance as a rupture of the contract, and will be able to demand an indemnification. Tenth, in the case where Mr. Lumley should cede his enterprise to another, he has the right to transfer this contract to his successor, and in that case Mademoiselle Wagner has the same obligations and the same rights towards the last as towards Mr. Lumley.

ALBERT WAGNER."

The bill stated, that in November, 1851, Joseph Bacher met the plaintiff in Paris, when the plaintiff objected to the agreement as not containing a usual and necessary clause preventing the defendant Johanna Wagner from exercising her professional abilities in England without the consent of the plaintiff, whereupon Joseph Bacher, as the agent of the defendants Johanna Wagner and Albert Wagner, and being fully authorised by them for the purpose, added an article in writing which was as follows:

"Mademoiselle Wagner engages herself not to use her talents at any other theatre, nor in any concert or re-union, public or private, without the written authorisation of Mr. Lumley.

DR. JOSEPH BACHER,
For Mademoiselle Johanna Wagner, and authorised by her."

The bill then stated that the defendants J. and A. Wagner subsequently made another engagement with the defendant Gye, by which it was agreed that the

A defendant J. Wagner should, for a larger sum than that stipulated by the agreement with the plaintiff, sing at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, and abandon the agreement with the plaintiff. The bill stated that the defendant Gye had full knowledge of the previous agreement with the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff had received a protest from the defendants J. and A. Wagner repudiating the agreement on the allegation that the plaintiff had failed to fulfil the pecuniary portion of the agreement.

B The bill prayed that the defendants Johanna Wagner and Albert Wagner might be restrained from violating or committing any breach of the last article of the agreement; that the defendant Johanna Wagner might be restrained from singing and performing or singing at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, or at any other theatre or place without the sanction or permission in writing of the plaintiff

C during the existence of the agreement with the plaintiff; that the defendant Albert Wagner might be restrained from permitting or sanctioning the defendant Johanna Wagner singing and performing or singing as aforesaid; that the defendant Gye might be restrained from accepting the professional services of the defendant Johanna Wagner as a singer and performer or singer at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, or at any other theatre or place, and from permitting her to sing

D and perform or to sing at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, during the existence of the agreement with the plaintiff, without the permission or sanction of the plaintiff. The defendants A. and J. Wagner denied that Joseph Bacher was their authorised agent, at least for the purpose of adding the restrictive clause, and said that the plaintiff had failed to make the stipulated payment by the time mentioned in the agreement. The plaintiff having obtained an injunction from

E PARKER, V.-C., on May 9, 1852, the defendants now moved by way of appeal before the LORD CHANCELLOR to discharge his Honour's order.

Bethell, Malins, and Martindale for the defendants.

Bacon and H. Clarke for the plaintiff.

F LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C.—The question which I have to decide in the present case arises out of a very simple contract, the effect of which is, that the defendant Johanna Wagner should sing at Her Majesty's Theatre for a certain number of nights, and that she should not sing elsewhere (for that is the true construction) during that period. As I understand the points taken by the defendants' counsel

G ought not to grant an injunction except in cases connected with specific performance, or where the injunction, being to compel a party to forbear from committing an act (and not to perform an act), that injunction will complete the whole of the agreement remaining unexecuted.

I have to consider how the question stands on principle and on authority, and in so doing I shall observe upon some of the cases which have been referred to and commented upon by the defendants in support of their contention. The first was Martin v. Nuthin (1), in which the court issued an injunction restraining an act from being done where it clearly could not have granted any specific performance, but it was said that that case fell within one of the exceptions which the defendants admit are proper cases for the interference of the court, because there the ringing of the bells, sought to be restrained, had been agreed to be suspended

I by the defendant in consideration of the erection by the plaintiffs of a cupola and clock, the agreement being in effect the price stipulated for the defendant's relinquishing bell-ringing at stated periods. The defendant having accepted the benefit, but rejected the corresponding obligation, LORD MACCLESFIELD first granted the injunction which the Lords Commissioners, at the hearing of the cause, continued for the lives of the plaintiffs. That case, therefore, however it may be explained as one of the exceptional cases, is nevertheless a clear authority showing that this court has granted an injunction prohibiting the commission of an act in respect of which the court could never have interfered by way of specific performance.

The next case referred to was Barret v. Blagrove (2), which came first before LORD LOUGHBOROUGH, and afterwards before LORD ELDON. There a lease had originally been granted by the plaintiffs, the proprietors of Vauxhall Gardens, of an adjoining house, under an express covenant that the lessee would not carry on the trade of a victualler or retailer of wines or generally any employment that would be to the damage of the proprietors of Vauxhall Gardens. An underlease having been made to the defendants, who were violating the covenant by the sale of liquors, the proprietors of Vauxhall Gardens filed a bill for an injunction, which was granted by LORD LOUGHBOROUGH. It has been observed in the argument here that in granting the injunction LORD LOUGHBOROUGH said: "It is in the nature of specific performance," and that, therefore, that case also falls under one of the exceptional cases. When that case came before LORD ELDON, he dissolved the injunction, but upon a different ground, namely, on that of acquiescence for many years, and in a sense he treated it as a case of specific performance. As far as the words go, the observations of those two eminent judges would seem to justify the argument which has been addressed to me; in effect, however, it was only specific performance, because a prohibition, preventing the commission of an act may as effectually perform an agreement as an order for the performance of the act agreed to be done. The agreement in that case being that the house should not be opened for the purposes of entertainment to the detriment of Vauxhall Gardens, the court granted the injunction. That was a performance of the agreement in substance, and the term "specific performance" is aptly applied in such a case, but not in the sense in which it has been used before me.

It was also contended that the plaintiff's remedy, if any, was at law, but it is no objection to the exercise of the jurisdiction by injunction that the plaintiff may have a legal remedy. [Now, by s. 36 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925, law and equity are administered concurrently in the High Court.] Robinson v. Lord Byron (3), before LORD THURLOW, so very often commented upon by succeeding judges, is a clear illustration of that proposition, because in that case the defendant, Lord Byron, who had large pieces of water in his park which supplied the plaintiff's mills, was abusing his right by preventing a regular supply to the plaintiff's mill, and although the plaintiff had a remedy at law, yet this court felt no difficulty in restraining Lord Byron by injunction from preventing the regular flow of the water. Undoubtedly, there are cases such as that cited for the defendants of Collins v. Plumb (4), before LORD ELDON, in which this court has declined to exercise the power (which in that instance it was assumed to have had) of preventing the commission of an act, because such power could not be properly and beneficially exercised. In that case the negative covenant not to sell water to the prejudice of the plaintiffs was not enforced by LORD ELDON, not because he had any doubt about the jurisdiction of the court (for upon that point he had no doubt), but because it was impossible to ascertain every time the water was supplied by the defendants, whether it was or not to the damage of the plaintiffs, but, whether right or wrong, that learned judge, in refusing to exercise the jurisdiction on very sufficient grounds, meant in no respect to break in on the general rules deducible from the previous authorities.

At an early stage of the argument I adverted to the familiar cases of attorneys' clerks, and surgeons' and apothecaries' apprentices, and the like, in which this court has constantly interfered, simply to prevent the violation of negative covenants, but it was said that in such cases the court only acted on the principle that the clerk or apprentice had received all the benefit and that the prohibition operated upon a concluded contract, and, therefore, the injunction fell within one of the exceptional cases. I do not, however, apprehend that the jurisdiction of the court depends upon any such principle. It is obvious that in those cases the negative covenant does not come into operation until the servitude is ended, and therefore, that the injunction cannot be required or applied for before that period. The familiar case of a tenant covenanting not to do a particular act was also put during the argument, but it was said that in such a case the jurisdiction springs

- A out of the relation of landlord and tenant and that, the tenant having received the benefit of an executed lease, the injunction operates only so as to give effect to the whole contract. That, however, cannot be the principle on which this court interferes, for, beyond all doubt, where a lease is executed containing affirmative and negative covenants, this court will not attempt to enforce the execution of the affirmative covenants, either on the part of the landlord or the tenant, but will
- B leave it entirely to a court of law to measure the damages, though, with respect to the negative covenants, if the tenant, for example, has stipulated not to cut or lop timber, or any other given act of forbearance, the court does not ask how many of the affirmative covenants on either side remain to be performed under the lease, but acts at once by giving effect to the negative covenant, specifically executing it by prohibiting the commission of acts which have been stipulated not to be done.
- C So far, then, each of the cases to which I have referred appears to me to be in direct contravention of the rules which have been so elaborately pressed upon me by the defendants' counsel.

The present is a mixed case, consisting not of two correlative acts to be done, one by the plaintiff and the other by the defendants, which state of facts may have and in some cases has introduced a very important difference, but of an act to be

- D done by Johanna Wagner alone, to which is superadded a negative stipulation on her part to abstain from the commission of any act which will break in upon her affirmative covenant—the one being ancillary to, and concurrent and operating together with the other. The agreement to sing for the plaintiff during three months at his theatre, and during that time not to sing for anybody else, is not a correlative contract. It is, in effect, one contract, and though beyond all doubt
- E this court could not interfere to enforce the specific performance of the whole of this contract, yet in all sound construction and according to the true spirit of the agreement, the engagement to perform for three months at one theatre must necessarily exclude the right to perform at the same time at another theatre. It was clearly intended that Johanna Wagner was to exert her vocal abilities to the utmost to aid the theatre to which she agreed to attach herself. I am of opinion
- F that if she had attempted, even in the absence of any negative stipulation, to perform at another theatre, she would have broken the spirit and true meaning of the contract as much as she would now do with reference to the contract into which she has actually entered. Wherever this court has not proper jurisdiction to enforce specific performance, it operates to bind men's consciences, as far as they can be bound, to a true and literal performance of their agreements, and it will not suffer them to
- G depart from their contracts at their pleasure, leaving the party with whom they have contracted to the mere chance of any damages which a jury may give. The exercise of this jurisdiction has, I believe, had a wholesome tendency towards the maintenance of that good faith which exists in this country to a much greater degree perhaps than in any other, and, although the jurisdiction is not to be extended, yet a judge would desert his duty who did not act up to what his predecessors
- H have handed down as the rule for his guidance in the administration of such an equity.

It was objected that the operation of the injunction in the present case was mischievous, excluding the defendant Johanna Wagner from performing at any other theatre while this court had no power to compel her to perform at Her Majesty's Theatre. It is true that I have not the means of compelling her to sing, but she

- I has no cause of complaint if I compel her to abstain from the commission of an act which she has bound herself not to do, and thus possibly cause her to fulfil her engagement. The jurisdiction which I now exercise is wholly within the power of the court, and, being of opinion that it is a proper case for interfering, I shall leave nothing unsatisfied by the judgment I pronounce. The effect, too, of the injunction, in restraining Johanna Wagner from singing elsewhere may, in the event of an action being brought against her by the plaintiff, prevent any such amount of vindictive damages being given against her as a jury might probably be inclined to give if she had carried her talents and exercised them at the rival theatre. The injunction may also, as I have said, tend to the fulfilment of her engagement, though, in continuing the injunction, I disclaim doing indirectly what I cannot do directly. A

Referring again to the authorities, I am well aware that they have not been uniform, and that there undoubtedly has been a difference of decision on the question now revived before me, but, after the best consideration which I have been enabled to give to the subject, the conclusion at which I have arrived is, I conceive, supported by the greatest weight of authority. The earliest case most directly bearing on the point is that of Morris v. Colman (5). There Mr. Colman was a part proprietor with Mr. Morris of the Haymarket Theatre; they were partners in that concern, and by the deed of partnership Mr. Colman agreed that he would not exercise his dramatic abilities for any other theatre than the Haymarket. He did not, however, covenant that he would write for the Haymarket, but it was merely a negative covenant that he would not write for any other theatre than the Haymarket. LORD ELDON granted an injunction against Mr. Colman writing for any other theatre than the Haymarket, and the ground on which LORD ELDON assumed that jurisdiction was the subject of some discussion at the Bar. It was truly said for the defendants that that was a case of partnership, and it was said, moreover, that LORD COTTENHAM was mistaken in Dietrichsen v. Cabburn (6), when he said that LORD ELDON had not decided Morris v. Colman (5) on the ground of there being a partnership. I agree that the observations which fell from LORD ELDON in the subsequent case of Clarke v. Price (7), show that he did mainly decide it on the ground of partnership; but he did not decide it exclusively on that ground. In the argument of Morris v. Colman (5), Sir Samuel Romilly suggested a case almost identical with the present. He contended that the clause restraining Mr. Colman from writing for any other theatre was no more against public policy than a stipulation that Mr. Garrick should not perform at any other theatre than that at which he was engaged would have been. LORD ELDON, adverting in his judgment to the case put at the Bar, said (18 Ves. at p. 438): B C D E

"If Mr. Garrick was now living, would it be unreasonable that he should contract with Mr. Colman to perform only at the Haymarket Theatre, and Mr. Colman with him to write for the theatre alone? Why should they not thus engage for the talents of each other?" F

He gives the clearest enunciation of his opinion that that would be an agreement which this court would enforce by way of injunction.

SHADWELL, V.-C., of whom I always wish to be understood to speak with the greatest respect, decided in a different way in Kemble v. Kean (8) and Kimberley v. Jennings (9), on which I shall presently make a few observations. In the former case, he observed that LORD ELDON must be understood, in Morris v. Colman (5), to have spoken according to the subject-matter before him, and must there be considered to be addressing himself to a case in which Colman and Garrick would both have had a partnership interest in the theatre. I must, however, entirely dissent from that interpretation. LORD ELDON's words are perfectly plain, they want no comment upon them, they speak for themselves. He was alluding to a case in which Garrick, as a performer, would have had nothing to do with the theatre beyond the implied engagement that he would not perform anywhere else, and I have come to a very clear conclusion that LORD ELDON would have granted the injunction in that case, although there had been no partnership. G H

The authority of Clarke v. Price (7) was much pressed upon me by the learned counsel for the defendants, but that is a case which does not properly belong to their argument because there there was no negative stipulation, and I quite admit that this court cannot enforce the performance of such an affirmative stipulation as is to be found in that case. There the defendant having agreed to take notes of cases in the Court of Exchequer and compose reports for the plaintiff, and having failed to do so, the plaintiff, Mr. Clarke, filed a bill for an injunction, and LORD ELDON, when refusing the injunction, in effect said, I cannot compel Mr. Price to I

A sit in the Court of Exchequer and take notes and compose reports. The whole of his judgment shows that he proceeded (and so it has been considered in later cases) on the ground that there was no covenant on the part of the defendant that he would not compose reports for any other person. The expressions in the judgment are [Morris v. Colman (5)] :

B "I cannot, as in the other case, say that I will induce him to write for the plaintiff by preventing him from writing for any other person," and then come these important words, "for that is not the nature of the agreement."

C LORD ELDON, therefore, was of opinion, upon the construction of that agreement, that it would be against its meaning to affix to it a negative quality and import a covenant into it by implication, and he, therefore, very properly as I conceive, refused that injunction. That case, therefore, in no respect touches the question now before me, and I may at once declare that if I had only to deal with the affirmative covenant of the defendant Johanna Wagner that she would perform at Her Majesty's Theatre, I should not have granted any injunction.

D Thus far, I think, the authorities are very strong against the defendants' contention, but Kemble v. Kean (8) is the first case which has in point of fact introduced all the difficulties on this part of the law. There Mr. Kean entered into an agreement precisely similar to the present: he agreed that he would perform for Mr. Kemble at Drury Lane, and that he would not perform anywhere else during the time that he had stipulated to perform for Mr. Kemble. Mr. Kean broke his engagement, a bill was filed, and SHADWELL, V.-C., was of opinion that he could not grant an injunction to restrain Mr. Kean from performing elsewhere, which he was either about to do or actually doing, because the court could not enforce the performance of the affirmative covenant that he would perform at Drury Lane for Mr. Kemble. Being pressed by that passage which I have read from in the Lord Chancellor's judgment in Morris v. Colman (5), he put that paraphrase or commentary upon it which I have referred to, i.e., he says: "LORD ELDON is speaking of a case where the parties are in partnership together." I have come to a different conclusion, and I am bound to say that, in my apprehension, Kemble v. Kean (8) was wrongly decided and cannot be maintained. The same learned judge followed up his decision in that case in the subsequent one of Kimberley v. Jennings (9). That was a case of hiring and service, and the vice-chancellor there virtually admitted that a negative covenant might be enforced in this court, and quoted an instance to that effect within his own knowledge. He said (6 Sim. at p. 351):

G "I remember a case in which a nephew wished to go on the stage, and his uncle gave him a large sum of money in consideration of his covenanting not to perform within a particular district; the court would execute such a covenant, on the ground that a valuable consideration had been given for it."

H He admits, therefore, the jurisdiction of the court, if nothing but that covenant remained to be executed. The learned judge, however, adds (6 Sim. at pp. 351, 352):

I "but here the negative covenant does not stand by itself: it is coupled with the agreement for service for a certain number of years, and then, for taking the defendant into partnership: . . . this agreement cannot be performed in the whole, and therefore this court cannot perform any part of it."

Whatever may have been the mutual obligations in that case which prevented the court from giving effect to the negative covenant, I am not embarrassed with any such difficulties here, because, as I have already shown, both the covenants are on the part of the defendants.

Hooper v. Broderick (10) was cited as an instance in which the court had refused an injunction under circumstances like the present, but in that case the lessee of an inn had covenanted to use and keep it open as an inn during a certain time and not to do any act whereby the licence might become forfeited. In point of fact the application was that he might be compelled to keep it open, and the vice-chancellor makes this observation (11 Sim. at p. 49): A

"The court ought not to have restrained the defendant from discontinuing to use and keep open the demised premises as an inn, which is the same in effect as ordering him to carry on the business of an innkeeper; but it might have restrained him from doing, or causing or permitting to be done, any act which would have put it out of his power, or the power of any other person, to carry on that business on the premises. It is not, however, shown that the defendant has threatened, or intends to do, or to cause or permit to be done, any act whereby the licences may become forfeited or be refused; and therefore the injunction must be dissolved." B

That, therefore, is an authority directly against the defendants because it shows that, if there had been an intention to break the negative covenant, this court would have granted the injunction. C

Smith v. Fromont (11) was also relied upon by the defendants as an instance where the injunction had been refused, but there was no negative covenant. It was an attempt to restrain by injunction a man from supplying horses to a coach for a part of a road when the party who was applying for the injunction was himself incapable of performing his obligation to horse his part of the road. LORD ELDON, in refusing the injunction and deprecating the interference of the court in such cases, there said (2 Swan. at p. 332): D

"The only instance I recollect of an application to this court to restrain the driving of coaches occurred in the case of a person who, having sold the business of a coach proprietor from Reading to London, and undertaking to drive no coach on that road, afterwards established one. With some doubt, whether I was not degrading the dignity of this court by interfering, I saw my way in that case; because one party had there covenanted absolutely against interfering with the business which he had sold to the other." E

That again is a direct authority, therefore, against the defendants, as LORD ELDON expressly says he had interfered in the case of a negative covenant, although he could not interfere on that occasion because there was no such covenant. F

Some observations have been made upon a decision of my own in Ireland in Gervais v. Edwards (12). That decision I believe to be right, but it is quoted to show that I was of opinion that this court cannot interfere to enforce specific performance, unless it can execute the whole of an agreement. I abide by the opinion I there expressed, and I mean to do nothing in this case which shall in any manner interfere with that opinion. That was properly a case for specific performance, but from the nature of the contract itself there was a portion of it which could not be executed. I said in effect: I cannot execute this contract which is intended to be binding on both parties. I cannot execute a portion of this contract for one, and leave the other portion of the contract unexecuted for the other, and, therefore, as I cannot execute the whole of the contract, I am bound to execute no part of it. That, however, has no bearing on the present case, for here I leave nothing unperformed which the court can ever be called upon to perform. G

In Hills v. Croll (13), LORD LYNTHURST refused to enforce an injunction to restrain the violation of a negative covenant. It was a case in which A. had given to B. a sum of money, and B. covenanted that he would buy all the acids he wanted from the manufactory of A., who covenanted that he would supply the acids, and B. also covenanted that he would buy his acids from no other person. LORD LYNTHURST refused to prohibit B. from obtaining acids from any other quarter, both because the covenants were correlative and because he could not compel A. to supply B. with acids. If, therefore, he had restrained B. from taking acids from any other quarter, he might have ruined him in the event of A. breaking his affirmative covenant to supply the acids. That case has never H I

A been rightly understood. It is supposed that LORD LYNTHURST's decision was based upon a wrong principle; that he followed the authority of Gervais v. Edwards (12) and such cases, and that he improperly applied the rule which was in that class of cases properly applied, but under the circumstances of the case before him I think the rule was not improperly applied.

B The next case which has been so much observed upon was that, before LORD COTTENHAM, of Dietrichsen v. Cabburn (6). That was a very simple case, and the question upon what principle it was decided, formed the subject of discussion before me. A man, in order to obtain a great circulation of his patent medicine, entered into a contract with a vendor of such articles, giving him a general agency for the sale of the medicine, with 40 per cent. discount, and stipulating that he would not supply anybody else at a larger discount than 25 per cent. He violated C his contract and was proceeding to employ other agents with a larger discount than 25 per cent.; an injunction was applied for and was granted; and it was said that it was properly granted because it was a case of partnership. This, however, was not the fact. It was not a case of partnership, but was strictly one of principal and agent, and it was only because there was the negative covenant that the court gave effect to it. It is impossible to read LORD COTTENHAM's judgment D without being satisfied that he did not consider it to be a partnership, though he said it was in the nature of a partnership, and in a popular sense it might be so called, because the parties were there both dealing with respect to the same subject, from which each was to have a benefit, but in no legal sense was it a partnership.

E Up to the period when Dietrichsen v. Cabburn (6) was decided, I apprehend that there could have been no doubt on the law as applicable to this case, except for the authority of SHADWELL, V.-C., but with great submission it appears to me that the whole of that learned judge's authority is removed by himself by his decision in the later case of Rolfe v. Rolfe (14). In that case A., B. and C. were partners as tailors. A. and B. went out of the trade on consideration of receiving £1,000 each, and C. was to continue the business on his own account. A. entered F into a covenant that he would not carry on the trade of a tailor which he had just sold, within certain limits, and C. entered into a covenant that he would employ A. as cutter at a certain allowance. The bill was filed simply for an injunction to prevent A. from setting up as a tailor within the prescribed limits, and the vice-chancellor granted that injunction. It was objected that this court could not grant the injunction when there was something remaining to be performed, for that A. had a right to be employed as a cutter, which right this court G would not even attempt to deal with or enforce as against C. That case, therefore, was open to a difficulty which does not occur here. In fact the same difficulty which might have arisen in Hills v. Croll (13) before LORD LYNTHURST. But the vice-chancellor held that to be no difficulty at all, observing that the bill simply asked for an injunction which he would grant, although he could not give effect to H the affirmative covenant to do the act in respect of which no specific performance was asked. His own decisions in Kemble v. Kean (8), and in Kimberley v. Jennings (9), were pressed upon him, but he observed (15 Sim. at p. 89):

I "that the bills in the cases cited asked for specific performance of the agreement, and that the injunctions were sought as only ancillary to that relief; but the bill in the present case asked merely for an injunction."

He no longer put it on the inability of the court to enforce a negative covenant, but he put it on the form of the pleadings. Whether that form was sufficient to justify his opinion is a question with which I need not deal, but I am very clearly of opinion that Rolfe v. Rolfe (14) does remove the whole weight of that learned judge's authority on this subject. It was said in argument that the injunction prayed in Rolfe v. Rolfe (14) was merely ancillary to the relief, but it will be seen that that was not so, and that the prayer extended only to the injunction and had nothing to do with relief in the shape of specific performance. And the learned judge himself stated that, if it had gone to that extent, he, following his former decisions, would not have granted the injunction. A

From a careful examination of all these authorities I am of opinion that the principles and rules deducible from them are in direct contravention of those principles and rules which were so elaborately pressed upon me during the argument, and I wish it to be distinctly understood that I entertain no doubt whatever that the point of law has been properly decided in the court below. It was, nevertheless, and with some reason, said, that although the point of law should be decided in the plaintiff's favour, still he might be excluded from having the benefit of it on the merits of the case. B

[HIS LORDSHIP examined the statements in the answers and affidavits as to the unauthorised addition of the restrictive clause and as to the non-fulfilment by the plaintiff of his portion of the agreement. HIS LORDSHIP concluded by saying that, looking at the merits and circumstances of the case as well as at the point of law raised, he must refuse this motion with costs. C

Motion refused.

Conflict of Laws—Foreign judgment—Defence to proceedings in England—Res judicata.

Where a given matter becomes the subject of litigation in, and of adjudication by, a court of competent jurisdiction, the court requires the parties to that litigation to bring forward their whole case, and will not, except in special circumstances, permit the same parties to open the same subject of litigation in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as part of the subject in contest, but which was not brought forward only because they have, from negligence, inadvertence, or even accident, omitted part of their case. The plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points on which the court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time. I

Demurrer to a bill filed in May, 1843, by Bethel Henderson against Elizabeth Henderson, the widow of Jordan Henderson (the plaintiff's deceased brother), Charles Simms and Joanna, his wife (the daughter of Jordan), and J. Gadsden (administrator of the estate of Jordan, in England), praying that an account might be taken of what was due to the plaintiff from the estate of Jordan, and of the other debts of Jordan, and of his personal estate, and that the same might be applied in a due course of administration; that an account of the partnership transactions between the plaintiff and Jordan might be also taken; that all necessary inquiries might be directed to ascertain the personal estate of William, the father of the plaintiff and Jordan; that so much, if any, of two sums of £8,883 6s. 8d. as might be found payable by the plaintiff (he not admitting that any part thereof was so payable) might be applied and administered as part of the assets of Jordan: that the defendants, Elizabeth, the widow, and Simms and his wife, might be restrained by injunction from proceeding with any action to recover the said two sums of £8,883 6s. 8d.; and that a commission might be issued to examine witnesses in Newfoundland. To this bill, the defendants, Elizabeth, the widow, and Simms and his wife, demurred for want of equity, want of parties, and multifariousness.

Purvis and Bagshawe for the bill.

WIGRAM, V.-C.—The plaintiff by his bill alleges that he and Jordan, his late brother, were partners in business, one branch of which was carried on at Bristol and the other in Newfoundland, and that, in respect of that partnership, he is a creditor to a large amount on the estate of Jordan, that part of the partnership property was derived from their father, and that all the property which they derived from their father formed part of the assets of the partnership. The plaintiff also alleges that he is a creditor on the estate of Jordan in respect of a private debt, and the bill prays such an account as would comprise all these matters which are in question between the plaintiff and the estate of Jordan. Upon these facts, a decree for an account against Gadsden, the personal representative of Jordan in England, would be of course, and, perhaps, also, if that had been the object of the suit, the decree for an account might have been extended to Elizabeth, the widow, as the personal representative of Jordan in Newfoundland. The widow of Jordan, and Simms and his wife, are, however, before the court in the character of next-of-kin, and there is no pretence for making them parties in that character in a suit for the mere administration of the estate of Jordan. The relief sought against those parties is founded upon the proceedings which have taken place in the court in Newfoundland, and the use which they are about to make of those proceedings in this country. The defendants, who have demurred, insist, in support of their demurrer, first, that all and every part of the matter in question on this bill was concluded by a final decree of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, dated in June, 1841, made in a suit wherein the defendants and William, the son of Jordan, were plaintiffs, and the present plaintiff was defendant, except in so far as that decree is subject to be reviewed in the Privy Council; and, secondly, that by that decree the amount recovered was decreed to be paid to the plaintiffs in that suit as beneficial owners, and that the same thereby ceased to be part of the estate of Jordan, subject to his debts. They insist, moreover, that the proceedings appear upon the bill with sufficient certainty to sustain the decree upon the grounds advanced, and that the only party against whom the plaintiff can proceed to recover his claim, or any part of it, is the defendant Gadsden.

I have read the bill carefully, and, without going minutely through the facts of the case, it is sufficient to say, for the purpose of explaining the order I am about to make, that the original bill in the Supreme Court of Newfoundland claimed an account of the same partnership dealings as those of which accounts are prayed by the present bill, and also sought accounts in respect of the estate of William Henderson, the father, possessed by Bethel on account of Jordan; that the defendant in that suit, who is the plaintiff here, made claims by his answer to the original bill corresponding in substance with those which he makes by his bill in the present suit; that an amended bill, or a bill which the court thought it right to term an amended bill, was afterwards filed by the same plaintiffs against Bethel; and that the amended bill stated and charged that Bethel was largely indebted to the estate of Jordan, on the partnership accounts, but that such accounts could not be taken in consequence of Bethel absenting him-

A self from the island and not producing the documents. It further appears that, Bethel having absented himself from the jurisdiction, an order of the Supreme Court was made in February, 1840, for taking the amended bill pro confesso, and that the amended bill was by the same order referred to the Master to compute principal and interest due to the plaintiffs, and that the Master made his report in June 1840. It appears, further, that the Supreme Court pronounced its final decree in June, 1841, and thereby, after referring to all the antecedent proceedings in the cause, decreed that Bethel Henderson should pay to the widow and two children of Jordan, who were plaintiffs, the sum of £8,888 6s. 8d. each, and the costs of the suit. This decree has in effect severed William, the father's, estate from the bulk of the property in question, and the partnership accounts and the private debt are not specifically the subject of adjudication. Upon this decree, Elizabeth, the widow, and Joanna, the daughter of Jordan, and the husband of Joanna have brought their actions in this country.

B The bill charges that the proceedings leading to this decree were irregular, that the decree itself was irregular, that a large balance was due to the plaintiff, and that the decree ought not to be enforced, but ought to be reversed by Her Majesty in Council, on appeal, which the plaintiff intends to bring. The bill specially alleges, as one ground of irregularity, that the report of the Master, of June 6, 1840, wholly omitted any notice of the account connected with the partnership, and is confined to the monies alleged to be due from the plaintiff, in respect of the estate of William Henderson, the father, and that a large sum of money is due to the plaintiff on the partnership accounts, as would appear if they were properly taken. On behalf of the defendants, it has been argued that the proceedings on the face of the bill showed that the decree concluded the whole matter, that I could not re-hear that decree, and that it was final and conclusive unless reversed by the Privy Council, the proper appellate tribunal.

E Without giving any opinion upon the question whether charges showing that the proceedings in a foreign court were altogether null and void, as being against natural justice, would or not, upon general demurrer, have been treated as null, and have sustained the bill as to the whole of the relief prayed, I have no doubt that mere irregularity in the proceedings is insufficient for that purpose, in a case in which an appeal lies from the colonial court to the mother country, and there is a tribunal competent to reform the errors of the court below, and even to suspend the execution of the decree pending the appeal, if justice requires that it should be suspended. But as the plaintiff in this case argued only that the whole question between the parties was not concluded by the decree, and did not contend that, upon the charges in the bill, I ought to disregard the decree, I assume for the present purpose that I must, upon this demurrer, consider the amount due from Bethel, in respect of William the father's estate, as concluded by the decree of the supreme court, subject only to the appeal to the Privy Council, and that the only question I have now to decide is whether I am to consider the partnership account and the claim of Bethel in respect of the private account as having been likewise the subject of adjudication by the Supreme Court in the island, or whether those items in the general account, which certainly might have been taken in that suit, are to be considered as excepted out of the operation of the decree, under the special circumstances appearing on the Master's report, and the other proceedings stated in the bill.

H I In trying this question, I believe I state the rule of the court correctly, when I say, that where a given matter becomes the subject of litigation in, and of adjudication by, a court of competent jurisdiction, the court requires the parties to that litigation to bring forward their whole case, and will not (except under special circumstances) permit the same parties to open the same subject of litigation in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as part of the subject in contest, but which was not brought forward only because they have, from negligence, inadvertence, or even accident, omitted part of their case. The plea of res judicata applies, except in special case, not only to points upon which the court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time. A

Those who have had occasion to investigate the subject of bills of review in this court will not discover anything new in the proposition I have stated, so far as it may apply to proceedings in this country: and in an application to a court of equity in this country, for its aid against the effect of a proceeding by a court of equity in one of the colonies, I conceive it to be the duty of this court to apply the same reasoning, at least in the absence of charges in the bill, showing that a different principle ought to be applied. The observations of LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., in Breadalbane v. Chandos (1) have an important bearing upon this point, I may mention also Farquharson v. Seton (2), Partridge v. Usborne (3), and the judgment of LORD ELDON, L.C., in Chamley v. Lord Dunsany (4), as showing the general principle to which I have adverted. It is plain that litigation would be interminable if such a rule did not prevail. B C

Undoubtedly the whole of the case made by this bill might have been adjudicated upon in the suit in Newfoundland, for it was of the very substance of the case there, and prima facie, therefore, the whole is settled. The question then is whether the special circumstances appearing upon the face of this bill are sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the general rule. What are those circumstances? One circumstance relied upon was that, by the decree of the colonial court of Feb. 11, 1840, the amended bill was only taken pro confesso. The amended bill, it appears, is not, as in this court, the original bill amended and written upon, so that the amended bill wholly supersedes and comes in the place of the original bill, but the amendments are upon a distinct record. The bill in this cause charges that the last bill was in fact and substance an original bill and addressed to different judges, and that it was not an amended bill. This charge I might have been bound to take as a fact, if the plaintiff had not, by setting out the amended bill and the final decree, given me an opportunity of judging in what sense only the charge is true. I find that the amended bill proceeds upon and refers to the original bill and to the answer of the defendant thereto, and the final decree of the court recites the whole of the proceedings anterior to the final decree, beginning with the original bill. It is impossible, therefore, to contend with effect that the amended bill, though in a sense distinct from the original bill, as being written upon other paper, leaving the first bill still on the record, was not a continuance of the pleadings in one and the same cause, and this, critically considered, is not inconsistent with the charge in the bill which I have just read. D E F G

Another objection was the absence or the irregularity of service upon the plaintiff. Although it is not necessary that I should go into the question respecting the notice, I ought not to disregard the fact that the plaintiff represents that he had, on different occasions, actual notice of the suit, and of the relief which was sought against him by it, however irregularly that notice might have been communicated; and if the plaintiff thought that he might safely disregard the proceedings and abstain from interposing any defence on the ground of their irregularity, I think I ought to consider him as having relied on the strength of his case for establishing that irregularity by a complaint in the same jurisdiction, or in the Court of Appeal, and not to have relied on being able to set the decree of the Supreme Court at defiance, even while it remained unreversed. I may here recur to the observation, that the omission of the Master to take the partnership accounts is stated in the bill to be an error in the decree, forming one ground for appeal to the Privy Council. The point upon which I have had most difficulty in satisfying myself is this. If the decree of the Supreme Court is conclusive upon one party, it must, I conceive, be conclusive upon both; and, if not conclusive upon both, it ought to be conclusive upon neither. The amended bill alleged that the plaintiffs there were creditors upon the partnership account, but that the accounts H I

A of the partnership could not be taken, owing to the manner in which the defendant in that suit had acted. These allegations were established as facts by the effect of the order for taking the bill pro confesso, and it appeared to me during the argument that the present defendants (the plaintiffs in Newfoundland) might have a right to say that the accounts not taken by the Master were open for their benefit, by reason that it was the conduct of the defendant alone which had prevented those accounts from being taken. But that, I think, is not a correct view of the case. The decree was to compute what was due to the plaintiffs for principal and interest—that is, upon all the accounts in question in the pleadings, including the partnership and private account. The plaintiffs were not compelled to take such a decree, but, having taken it, they are bound by the consequences, and must be taken to have waived any disadvantage to themselves which would result from it.

C The conclusion to which I must come, in a case where relief is sought in this court in consequence of errors and irregularities in the decree of a colonial court—and an appeal lies from that decree to the appellate jurisdiction in this kingdom—is to allow the demurrer. I do not say that my conclusions would have been the same if the proceedings which were impeached had taken place in a foreign court
D from which there was no appeal to any superior jurisdiction which a court of equity in this country could regard as certain to administer justice in the case. I express no opinion on that point.

Demurrer allowed.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to set aside the verdict, and for a new trial in an action of assumpsit by which the plaintiff claimed damages for breach of an agreement in writing, dated April 15, 1846, whereby the defendant agreed to grant and deliver to the plaintiff a good and valid lease of a certain dwelling-house, etc., and other hereditaments and premises in the agreement mentioned, for a term of twenty-one years from the 29th day of September then next ensuing, at the yearly rent of £110. D

The declaration set out the agreement in terms, and, after alleging mutual promises, averred that, although the plaintiff had always been ready and willing to accept a lease, yet the defendant did not nor would grant a good and valid lease of the said dwelling-house, etc., and discharged the plaintiff from preparing and tendering such lease, and wholly neglected and refused to grant or deliver the said or any lease whatever of the said hereditaments and premises; "whereby the plaintiff lost and was deprived of great gains and profits, which would otherwise have accrued to him, and paid, expended, and incurred liability to pay divers sums of money, in and about the preparation of the said agreement and lease, etc., amounting, to wit, to £20." Plea, payment of £25 into court, and no damages ultra. The plaintiff replied damages ultra, upon which issue was joined. E

At the trial, before LORD DENMAN, C.J., at the Surrey Spring Assizes, 1847, it was proved that the plaintiff and defendant had entered into the agreement set out in the declaration, by which the defendant agreed to grant to the plaintiff a good and valid lease of a dwelling-house and premises, situate in High Street, Croydon, for a term of twenty-one years from Sept. 29, 1846, at a yearly rent of £110. The premises in question had belonged to the defendant's father, who was recently dead, and in consequence, the plaintiff's solicitor, while preparing the agreement, asked the defendant whether he was sure that he had power to grant the lease without the concurrence of other parties, and suggested that the will might have vested the legal estate, or the power of leasing, in trustees. The defendant replied, that there was nothing of the sort, that it was his property out and out, and that he alone had the power of leasing. It appeared, however, that the defendant's father had devised the premises in question (subject to an annuity of £300 to his daughter) to trustees, to pay the defendant a moiety of the rent during his life only. The premises were worth considerably more than £110 a year, and the bill of the plaintiff's solicitor, for preparing the agreement and lease, and investigating the title, amounted to £15 12s. 8d. F G H

On the part of the defendant, evidence was tendered to show that the plaintiff, when he entered into the agreement, had full knowledge of the defendant's incapacity to grant the lease; but the learned judge ruled that such evidence was inadmissible. It was urged, on the part of the defendant, that the plaintiff could I

A not recover damages for the loss of his bargain; and that, as the sum paid into court exceeded the expenses which he had been put to, the defendant was entitled to the verdict. The learned judge was of a different opinion, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff for £200, beyond the sum paid into court.

A rule nisi having been obtained to set aside the verdict, and for a new trial,

B Serjeant Shee and Willes for the plaintiff showed cause against the rule. Montagu Chambers supported the rule.

PARKE, B.—The rule must be discharged. The defendant contracted to grant a good and valid lease, and the learned judge was right in rejecting evidence which would go to alter the contract admitted by the plea.

C The next question is: What damages is the plaintiff entitled to recover? The rule of the common law is that where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed. Flureau v. Thornhill (1) qualified that rule of the common law. It was there held, that contracts for the sale of real estate are merely on condition that the vendor has a good title, so that, when a person contracts to sell real property, there is an implied understanding that, if he fail to make a good title, the only damages recoverable are the expenses which the vendee may be put to in investigating the title. The present case comes within the rule of the common law, and I am unable to distinguish it from Hopkins v. Grazebrook (2).

E ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. The damages have been assessed according to the general rule of law, that where a person makes a contract and breaks it, he must pay the whole damage sustained. Upon that general rule an exception was engrafted by Flureau v. Thornhill (1), and upon that exception Hopkins v. Grazebrook (2) engrafted another exception. This case comes within the latter, by which the old common law rule has been restored. Therefore, the defendant, having undertaken to grant a valid lease, not having any colour of title, must pay the loss which the plaintiff has sustained by not having that for F which he contracted.

PLATT, B.—Upon general principle, I cannot distinguish this case from Hopkins v. Grazebrook (2).

Rule discharged.

PELLEY v. WATHEN AND OTHERS

[COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY (Lord Cranworth and Knight-Bruce, L.JJ.), November 5, 6, 25, 1851]

Solicitor—Lien—Extent of lien—Lien no greater than client's right to retain—Purchase by client of land—Mortgage created by client before completion—Title deeds handed to purchaser's solicitors on completion—Enforcement of solicitors' lien against mortgagee.

A purchaser of property subject to a mortgage created, before the completion of his purchase, a second mortgage of the property. He afterwards created a third mortgage, with respect to which the second mortgagee's conduct was such as to give it priority over his. The purchase was completed, the purchaser paying off the first mortgage, and taking a conveyance to a trustee for himself. On this occasion the title deeds were handed to his solicitors, who afterwards took a transfer of the third mortgage. One of them was the trustee for the purchaser in the conveyance. The second mortgagee did not give them, nor had they, any notice of his security. On the question whether the solicitors had a lien over the title deeds either for their general bill of costs or for their costs relating to the conveyance which was enforceable against the second mortgagee,

Held: (i) it was the general doctrine that the rights of a solicitor in respect of his lien for his bill of costs were no greater than those of his client; (ii) there were no special circumstances exempting the present case from the general rule, the second mortgagee not being under any obligation to give notice of his mortgage to the mortgagor's solicitors; and (iii) the solicitors were, therefore, not entitled to any lien against the second mortgagee for their general bill of costs, and (per curiam, KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., dubitante) they could not claim a lien against the second mortgagee limited to the costs relating to the conveyance, notwithstanding that it enured partly for the benefit of the second mortgagee, because they had been employed solely by the mortgagor.

Notes. On the question whether the lien of a solicitor is affected by his taking a partner, WIGRAM, V.-C., stated that "he could not think that a solicitor's right of lien, where it existed, could be altered by taking a partner."

C Appeal by the defendants, Messrs. Wathen, Bassett & Gurney, who had acted as solicitors for William Lewis in connection with the purchase of certain land, from an order of WIGRAM, V.-C., reported 7 Hare, 351, made on the hearing of the cause, on exceptions to the Master's report, and on further directions, holding that they were not entitled as against the plaintiff, Pelly, a mortgagee of such land, to a lien on the title deeds either for their general bill of costs or for their costs relating to the conveyance. Previously to the month of September, 1839, William Lewis had contracted to purchase the equity of redemption of certain property in Gloucestershire, which was designated as the Lyppiatt estate, and which was subject to two large mortgages for £18,000 and £6,000. In order to enable him to raise money for completing the purchase, he agreed to sell part of the property to two gentlemen, who agreed to become purchasers. By an indenture of Sept. 14, 1839, he conveyed to the plaintiff all his real estates, including so much of the Lyppiatt estate as had not been so agreed to be sold, to hold the same to the plaintiff by way of mortgage for securing a running account not exceeding £10,000. By another indenture, dated Dec. 14, 1840, Lewis mortgaged a part of the Lyppiatt property, comprised in the plaintiff's mortgage, to Horatio James to secure £3,000; and, afterwards, by another mortgage, dated Sept. 8, 1841, he mortgaged the same property to Charles Barton, to secure £1,000.

The purchase of the property by Lewis had not, up to this time, been completed; but, in January, 1842, the transactions were brought to a close in the following manner. The parts of the property which had been agreed to be sold were conveyed to the purchasers, and, by means of their purchase-money or otherwise, the two old mortgages of £18,000 and £6,000 were paid off, and the legal fee in the parts not sold to the two sub-purchasers was conveyed to Thomas Bassett in trust for Lewis; and an outstanding term of 1,000 years was, at the same time, assigned to John Gurney in trust to attend the inheritance. At this time, Thomas Bassett and John Gurney carried on business as attorneys and solicitors in partnership with the defendant George Wathen, under the firm of Wathen, Bassett & Gurney; and that firm acted as solicitors for Lewis in the matter of the purchase, Wathen having in fact so acted for many years previously.

After the execution of these deeds, the only outstanding interests, exclusive of the plaintiff's mortgage, were the two mortgages vested in James and Barton. George Wathen agreed with Lewis to pay off those charges, and to take assignments thereof to himself. This was accordingly done by two indentures, both dated and executed on Feb. 14, 1842, so that George Wathen became a mortgagee for the two sums of £3,000 and £1,000. In the following month of August he advanced a further sum of £673 on security of the same premises, and thus became an encumbrancer for a principal sum of £4,673.

It was taken as a fact not in dispute that the plaintiff so conducted himself towards the parties to these securities, thus amounting to £4,673, that his mortgage, though prior in point of date, would be postponed to theirs. He had actively assisted Lewis in obtaining the loans from James and Barton, and neither to them, nor afterwards to George Wathen, did he communicate the fact of the existence of his mortgage of September, 1839, of which George Wathen had no notice till a few days before the institution of this suit, on Mar. 19, 1843. A

Upon the completion of the purchase by Lewis in January, 1842, the title deeds were all handed over to Messrs. Wathen, Bassett & Gurney, as solicitors of Lewis, and they claimed a lien on those deeds against the plaintiff for the amount of their bills of costs against Lewis; and the question for the court was whether this claim was valid. WIGRAM, V.-C., decreed against the lien; and against his decision the solicitors appealed. B

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 26, 1851. LORD CRANWORTH, L.J., delivered the following judgment of the court, in which after stating the facts as set out above, he proceeded.—The argument for the defendants divided itself into three heads. First, it was contended that, independently of any special circumstances, the lien of the solicitor must prevail; secondly, if this were not so, still that here there were circumstances which would give such a lien independently of any general right; and thirdly, it was argued that, even if there is no lien for the general costs due to the solicitor, still there is such a lien for the costs of and incidental to the procuring the conveyance. C

On the first point we think it clear that no such lien as that contended for exists. The general lien of a solicitor is merely a right to keep back from his client the deeds and papers, which he holds as solicitor, until his bill of costs is satisfied. It is a right derived entirely through the client, and, therefore, on the most obvious principles of justice, cannot go beyond the right of the client himself. If the client's right to the deeds which came to the hands of the solicitor is absolute, so will be the right of the solicitor. If the deeds in the hands of the client are subject to any rights outstanding in third parties, such rights will follow them into the hands of the solicitor. These consequences flow so immediately from the nature of the relation subsisting between the client and his solicitor, that, even independently of authority, we should have felt bound by the principles on which they depend. But we have the most ample authority in support of the view we take on this part of the case, in the three cases before SIR EDWARD SUGDEN, so much dwelt on in the argument. We allude to Smith v. Chichester (1), Blunden v. Desart (2), and Molesworth v. Robbins (3). In Molesworth v. Robbins (3) it was expressly decided, that the claim of a party, having an equitable right against the client, must prevail against the solicitor, into whose hands the deeds had come after such equitable right had arisen. Indeed, the principle is obviously the same, whether the right affecting the client's interest is legal or equitable. No man, as was stated by SIR EDWARD SUGDEN in his judgment, can give a lien to his solicitor of a higher nature than the interest he himself has in the deeds. D

Applying these principles to the facts of the present case, it appears to us clear, that (laying aside all consideration of particular conduct) the solicitor did not, on the completion of the contract, acquire any lien on the deeds against the plaintiff. If, on the completion of the contract and execution of the conveyance in January, 1842, the title deeds had been all handed over to Lewis himself and not to his solicitors, he would then have had them, subject to an equitable claim, on the part of the plaintiff, as mortgagee by virtue of his mortgage of September, 1839; and if Lewis had then put them into the hands of his solicitors, they could only have held them subject to the same rights as had attached on them in the hands of Lewis. It can make no difference, that instead of coming, first, into the hands of Lewis, and from him to the solicitors, they were at once handed over by the vendors to the solicitors. For the solicitors, in so obtaining them, obtained them, not by any title paramount to that of their client, but as his agents, and of course with all the liabilities which would have attached on them if they had passed first into the hands of the client, and from him to the solicitors. E

A This disposes of the first head of the argument. But then it was said, secondly, that whatever may be the general doctrine, here the conduct of the plaintiff was such as to preclude him from insisting on his title, against the lien of the solicitors of Lewis. But we can discover nothing whatever in the plaintiff's conduct to warrant such a proposition. When the plaintiff advanced his money and obtained his mortgage deed, in September, 1839, he of course employed his own solicitor to act for him. All which can be alleged against him by the solicitors of Lewis the mortgagor is, that he did not inform them of his security. But he was under no obligation to give them any such information, nor was it in the ordinary course of business that he should do so. There is no suggestion that he meant or wished to mislead them. There was nothing to suggest to his mind that it could be of importance to the solicitors that he should give them notice of his security. Cases may undoubtedly occur, in which parties, by standing by and remaining silent, may give to others rights against them, in the same way as if they had been active in making representations; but that can only be when it has been the duty of the party not to be silent, or when the party remaining silent might reasonably infer that such silence would be taken by others as sanctioning a particular course of conduct. No such circumstance exists here. The conduct of the plaintiff, for ought, at least, that appears, was just what might be expected from a man intending to deal with perfect fairness. He became mortgagor, employing his own solicitor, and took it for granted that the mortgagor and his solicitor would settle their own rights among themselves. There does not, therefore, appear to us to be anything in the conduct of the plaintiff depriving him of his ordinary rights.

The only remaining question is on the point whether the solicitors may not have a lien against the plaintiff, though not for their whole demand on Lewis, yet for so much as relates to the obtaining the conveyance of the Lyppiatt estate from the vendors. As to this the argument was, that these costs were incurred for the common benefit of the plaintiff and Lewis, and so that the lien of the solicitors ought to prevail against both the one and the other. On this minor point, KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., entertains some doubt, and I can, therefore, express my own opinion only. In my opinion these costs do not differ from the rest. I think the solicitors have no lien against the plaintiff for the costs of obtaining the conveyance, any more than for any other part of their bill.

The lien of the solicitor is a right to retain deeds as a mode of enforcing payment of a debt due by the party whose deeds are retained. It is essentially a right arising between the party employed and his employer. The right when once constituted, may, under circumstances, prevail in favour of the solicitor, not only against his employer, but also against parties deriving title under his employer. But it always originates from the relation of client and attorney, i.e., employer and employed. Taking this to be a correct view of the law, the question here is, Who employed Messrs. Wathen, Bassett & Gurney to obtain and perfect the conveyance? No doubt when they had completed the conveyance, their services enured to the benefit, not only of Lewis the purchaser, but also of the plaintiff, who claimed under him. But I do not think this is material. If the case could be brought to the point that the solicitors were acting not only for Lewis, but also for the plaintiff, then neither Lewis nor the plaintiff could take the deeds of conveyance out of their hands without paying them the full amount of their costs incurred in preparing and perfecting them. But this certainly was not so. The solicitors were the solicitors of Lewis, and of him only. He alone employed them. He alone was liable to pay them for their services, and against him alone, therefore, was their lien available when the deeds came into their hands. Their right is, as I think, precisely what it would have been, if, on the final settlement of the purchase and execution of the deeds, the vendors had delivered the deeds to Lewis and he had handed them over to the solicitors. In such a case the right of the solicitors would be only, as I think, to hold the deeds subject to all the rights, legal and equitable, affecting them in the hands of Lewis; and, therefore, their right was, as I conceive, subject to a prior right in the plaintiff in respect of his mortgage of September, 1839. I do not think there is any distinction between these deeds and the other A deeds in the hands of the solicitors.

The result, therefore, is, that the decision of WIGRAM, V.-C., will be affirmed in every respect, and this appeal must, therefore, be dismissed. KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., concurs with me in thinking that the costs of the appeal must in that case follow the event, and so be paid by the defendants, because the appeal reproducing litigation on points, manifestly, in the opinion of both members of this court, B properly decided by the vice-chancellor, has taken a range widely beyond the narrow and restricted part of the case, on which alone my learned brother entertains any doubt.

It is unnecessary to say that the question raised at the Bar, whether, if the lien had been established, it would have extended to the debts due to all the successive firms, or only to that due to the last firm; whether, in short, according to the C doctrine laid down in Re Forshaw (4), the lien of a solicitor is affected by his taking a partner, does not arise in this case. On that point we express no opinion.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Master and Servant—Wages—Incapacity for work—Sickness—Employer's liability to pay wages during servant's convalescence.

By an agreement in writing dated Dec. 30, 1848, the plaintiff agreed that he would serve the defendant as a brewer for a period of ten years and the defendant agreed to pay him £2 10s. a week during that time. The plaintiff served the defendant until Christmas, 1857, when, through illness, he became unable to perform his services, but he continued to receive his weekly wage until March, 1858. He then went away for a change of air for thirteen weeks, during which he received no wages, and on his return he resumed his work. In an action by him to recover wages in respect of the thirteen weeks, G

Held: the contract being still in force there should have been no suspension of the weekly payments by reason of the plaintiff's inability to work through illness, and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed. H

F

The declaration stated that, by a memorandum of agreement, dated Dec. 30, 1848, between the plaintiff of the one part, and one Watts, since deceased, and the defendant of the other part it was agreed that the plaintiff, in consideration of £20 paid by them to the plaintiff on the execution of the agreement, and also in consideration of weekly and other payments, the plaintiff agreed with them that he should well and truly serve the defendant and Watts for ten years as a brewer. Watts and the defendant, in consideration of the premises, agreed with the plaintiff that they should pay him £20 on the execution of the agreement, and should find and provide the plaintiff with a dwelling-house for his own occupation, and also coals during the whole of the term of ten years, and should pay him the weekly sum of £2 10s. during the term of ten years. Although all things had happened and been performed in order to entitle the plaintiff to the performance of the promise of the defendant, yet the defendant, after Watts' death, refused to permit the plaintiff to continue in his service under the agreement, and to earn his weekly wages, and refused to pay the plaintiff the sum of £2 10s. a week for thirteen weeks.

H

The fourth plea, which was pleaded to so much of the declaration as related to the claim for wages, stated that the plaintiff was not, during any part of the time in respect of which such wages were claimed, ready, willing, or able to render, and did not, in fact, during any part of such time, render the agreed or any service in manner and form as alleged. Issue was joined on this plea, and it was demurred to.

I

It was proved at the trial that the plaintiff had, under this agreement, served the defendant until Christmas, 1857, when he had an attack of rheumatic gout, which made him unable to perform his services. He received, however, his weekly wages until the following March, when he went to Brixton for a change of air, and was absent thirteen weeks, during which he received no wages, and for which period the present action was brought. Afterwards he returned and resumed his services.

Serjeant Hayes, having obtained a rule on the part of the defendant to set aside the verdict, it was arranged that the rule and the demurrer should be argued together. A

Cur. adv. vult. B

Nov. 25, 1858. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—We are of opinion that this plea is good, being pleaded only to the claim for wages, and it appeared that the plaintiff was not, during any part of the time in respect of which such wages are claimed, ready and willing or able to render, and did not in fact render, the agreed or any services. We think the gist of this plea is, that the plaintiff during the time in question was not ready and willing to render, and did not render, any services, and voluntarily and wilfully refused. If so, we think he could not claim for wages in consideration of his services. C

It was suggested that the breach of contract could only be the subject of a cross-action; but the alleged breach of contract on his part seems to go to the whole consideration for the wages. We must treat the demurrer as if the action were brought for the wages only, and to avoid circuity of action it may well be considered that this action should be barred, so as to prevent an unjust advantage in this action, and to put an end to further litigation, rather than that the plaintiff should be allowed to recover wages when he had refused to serve, and that another action should be brought against him to recover them back. Therefore, on the demurrer to the fourth plea, we give judgment for the defendant. D

Then as to the rule for entering the verdict on the fourth plea: the verdict was given for the plaintiff on the fourth plea, and this was a rule to set the verdict aside, and to enter it on that plea for the defendant. Whether, when issue is joined on such a plea, a want of ability to do an act proves, in point of law, a want of readiness and willingness, depends on whether this want of ability is necessarily a breach of the contract to perform a condition precedent, or the consideration for the promise sued on. In an action for not adopting goods purchased, issue being joined on a plea that the plaintiff was not ready and willing to deliver them, the defendant would be entitled to the verdict, on proof that the plaintiff never was in possession of the goods he undertook to deliver. But looking at the nature of the contract sued on in the action, we think that want of ability to serve for a week would not of necessity be an answer to a claim for a week's wages. In truth, the plaintiff was ready and willing to serve, or had been able to do so, and was only prevented serving during the week by the visitation of God, the contract to serve never having been determined. E

That leads to the consideration of the following question which was reserved at the trial, i.e., whether, in the circumstances, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The agreement is of a very peculiar nature: that the plaintiff should serve the defendant and Watts in the capacity of a brewer, and teach them to brew; that they were to pay the plaintiff £20 on the execution of the agreement; to find him a house; to supply him with coals for ten years, and to pay him the weekly sum of £2 10s. during the said term. We concur in the observations of WILLES, J., in Harmer v. Cornelius (1), that if the plaintiff, from unskilfulness, had been wholly incompetent to brew, or by the visitation of God had become, from paralysis or any other bodily illness, permanently incompetent to act in the capacity of a brewer to the defendant, we think the defendant might have determined the contract. He could not be considered incompetent by illness of a temporary nature; but if he had been struck with disease, so that he could not have been expected to return to his work, we think the defendant might have dismissed him and employed another brewer in his stead. Instead of being dismissed he returned to service; and the defendant and Watts, when he had been restored to them, employed him and paid him as before. F

- A At the trial the defendant's counsel admitted that the contract was not rescinded. The contract being in force, we think that there was no suspension of the weekly payment by reason of the plaintiff's illness, or inability to work. It is allowed that, under this contract, there could be no deduction from the weekly sum in respect of his being disabled by illness from brewing one day, or week; and while the contract remained in force, we see no difference between his being disabled for a
- B day, or a week, or a month. On the whole, therefore, we think that the verdict obtained by the plaintiff ought not to be disturbed, and that the rule granted for that purpose ought to be discharged.

Judgment for defendant on the demurrer.

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Kindersley, V.-C.), June 3, 4, 1859]

Power of Appointment—Exercise—Fraudulent exercise—Exercise to benefit person not intended to be benefited—Appointee ignorant of purpose of appointor.

E

Property was settled upon trust for C.M. for her life and after her death upon trust to pay one quarter of the income to her husband for his life, and, subject thereto, upon trust for such of C.M.'s children as she should appoint, and in default of appointment, for her children equally. Shortly before her death C.M. appointed the whole property, after her death and subject to her husband's interest, in favour of her eldest daughter. It was C.M.'s intention that her daughter would hand over one-half of the property to C.M.'s husband, and give him a life interest in the remaining one-half. The whole purpose of the appointment was for his benefit. The daughter stated that she was wholly ignorant of the appointment until after C.M.'s death, and that she had not made any bargain or agreement with reference to the funds appointed to her.

Held: although the court would not set aside an appointment on a mere suspicion that it had been exercised from a wrongful motive, it would do so if there were acts from which it could draw a legitimate inference that it had been exercised from an improper or corrupt motive; if there was such proof, it was not necessary, to constitute a fraud, that the appointee should be aware of the appointment or of the intention of the appointor; in the present case there was clear evidence that C.M. intended so to exercise the power as to defeat its real purpose, which was to appoint among children; and, accordingly, the appointment would be set aside.

Petition by Isabel Charlotte Martin, the eldest child of Charlotte Martin (formerly Marsden) praying that certain canal shares which had been appointed to her might be transferred out of court to her, the respondents being the younger children of Charlotte Martin, who claimed that the appointment was invalid.

By an indenture dated Oct. 14, 1836, certain canal shares were vested in trustees upon trust to pay the annual income of the shares to Charlotte Marsden for her own use and benefit during her life, or until she should attempt or agree to sell, assign, mortgage, charge or otherwise dispose of the same by way of anticipation; and it was provided that, if she did so, her interest in them should cease as if she was dead. Subject to this proviso the shares were limited, after the death of Charlotte Marsden, as to one-fourth part of the income, to any husband she might leave surviving, for his life. The indenture then directed that the trustees of the shares should hold them upon trust, from and after the decease of the said Charlotte Marsden, that the said canal shares should, subject and without prejudice to the trust thereinbefore declared in favour of any husband who should survive her, remain and be in trust for all and every or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or child or other issue of the said Charlotte Marsden, with such provisions for the respective maintenance, education and advancement at such age, day or time, or respective ages, days or times, and if more than one, in such parts, shares and proportions, and charged with such annual sums of money and limitations over for the benefit of the said children and issue, or some or one of them, and upon such conditions and with such restrictions and in such manner as the said Charlotte Marsden, whether covert or sole, and if under coverture, notwithstanding such coverture, should, by any deed or deeds, instrument or instruments, to be by her sealed and delivered in the presence of and attested by two or

A more credible witnesses, or by her last will and testament in writing, or any codicil or codicils in writing, or any writing in the nature of or purporting to be a will or codicil, to be by her signed and published in the presence of and attested by the like number of credible witnesses, from time to time direct or appoint, and in default of such direction or appointment, and so far as any such direction or appointment, if incomplete or partial, should not extend, in trust for all and every the children
B or child of the said Charlotte Marsden, who, being a son, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters, should attain that age, or marry under that age, with the consent of her or their parent or parents, guardian or guardians, for the time being, and to be divided between or amongst the said children, if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common.

C On Nov. 22, 1836, Charlotte Marsden married William John Martin, and there were six children born of that marriage, one of whom died an infant. By a deed-poll, dated July 24, 1857, Charlotte Marsden exercised the above-mentioned power of appointment, and appointed the canal shares after her decease, and subject to her husband's life-interest in the one-fourth of the income, to her daughter Isabel Charlotte Martin, in case she lived to attain twenty-one years of age, absolutely. Charlotte Martin died on Aug. 7, 1858, intestate; and Isabel Charlotte Martin
D attained her majority on Nov. 20 in the same year. She then applied to the trustees of the deed of 1836 to hand over to her the funds to which she was entitled, under the deed of appointment; but they refused to do so without the sanction of the court, and in February last the surviving trustee transferred the trust-funds into court.

E It appeared from the affidavit which was made by the trustee when he paid the money into court, that Mr. and Mrs. Martin were residing at Brussels when she executed the deed of appointment; that her husband wrote to his solicitor the following letter:

"July 10th, 1857.

F "Mrs. Martin wishes to make a will, of which she has the power under her marriage-settlement, leaving to her eldest daughter Isabel Charlotte the whole of the property, provided she, the said Isabel Charlotte, will, on coming of age, make over to her father one-half of the said property, giving him at the same time a life-interest in the other half. If the above cannot with perfect safety be done, then let the will be in favour of the eldest daughter absolutely."

Mr. Christie, the conveyancer, was accordingly instructed to advise in the matter;
G and he ultimately drew the deed of appointment, which Mrs. Martin executed in favour of her daughter. Mr. Christie advised that notice of the appointment should be given to the trustee of the indenture of 1836, and that Mrs. Martin should have the assistance of a separate solicitor in the execution of the appointment. That was done, and the effect of it explained to her; but she was at that time in very bad health. After the execution of the appointment, and after Mrs. Martin's death,
H considerable correspondence took place between the parties interested in the trust-funds. Isabel Charlotte Martin ultimately presented a petition, praying the transfer out of court to her of the canal shares, to which she was entitled under the appointment. The petition stated that Isabel Charlotte Martin was wholly ignorant, until after her mother's death, of the execution of the appointment by her, and that she never made any bargain or agreement with any one with reference to the funds
I appointed to her. The younger children of the marriage contended that the appointment was made on the understanding above mentioned, and was, therefore, a fraud upon the power, and void.

Shapter, Q.C. (Renshawe with him), for the petitioner.

Baily, Q.C. (Cracknall with him), for the younger children.

KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—The question in this case is whether the execution of a power of appointment is to be defeated on the ground that it is what is commonly called a fraud upon the power. The petitioner is the person in whose favour the power has been exercised, and she insists that the appointment is good. The other side say it is a fraud upon the power, having regard to the circumstances of the case which are by no means common. A

Upon the face of the instrument the power is well executed; and the question is whether, under the circumstances, it was a fraud upon the power. This power is in point of form a trust, to be exercised by a certain person in favour of certain objects of the trusts. These powers occur in a great many forms: one is, at the discretion of the donee with a view to accomplish some purpose for the benefit of certain other persons; and in such cases the persons to take under the power are in a great majority of instances the persons who would take in default of appointment; but on the failure of these there are often ulterior objects. I mention this because it may be one thing to do an act which turns out to be to the prejudice of the persons who take, if there are no immediate objects of the power, and another thing to do an act which is to defeat the immediate objects of it. B C

The purpose of such a power as this is to provide for the children of the marriage, but at the same time to preserve to the parent such powers as will keep the children under the control of the parent. The power is intended to enable the parent, when the children come into existence, to distribute and deal with the property as will be best for the objects of the power. I need hardly say that the same rules which are applicable to discretionary trusts generically, must be applicable to every species of them. As you cannot enter into a man's mind and so conjecture what were his motives, unless there are some acts from which we can draw a legitimate inference as to his motives, whenever there is a discretionary trust, and that discretion is exercised either improperly or corruptly—unless you can show that to the court, the court will not control the exercise of the discretion. You may have a suspicion that the power has been exercised from a particular motive; but if it is a mere suspicion, and not a matter of clear, judicial inference, you must leave it as you find it. When, however, we find that trustees have a discretionary trust, and it is proved to the satisfaction of the judicial mind that the exercise has been either corrupt or for purposes which have the effect of defeating, instead of carrying out, the trusts, then the court will not uphold that exercise of the power. D E F

This is, not a general, but a special power, and as to a special power, whether exclusive or with power to appoint among the children generally, if the donee of such a power attempt to exercise it in plain terms in favour of a person who is not an object of the power, that is no proper exercise of the power—it is no exercise of it at all. If a person having a power to appoint to A. appoints to B., that is, of course, void. But when the donee exercises the power so that upon the face of the instrument it is not entirely within the scope of the power—that is to say, not in favour of the objects of the power alone—then arises the question whether it is a fraud upon the power—whether it was exercised under such circumstances that the court will say the appointment ought not to be sustained. If a power be honestly exercised, the court will not control its exercise, though it may be exercised capriciously or under a prejudice for a particular child. G H

In this case it is clear and proved that, for two years before this instrument was executed, Mr. and Mrs. Martin had had the settlement under discussion. And why? Because it excluded the husband from that interest which he usually has under a marriage-settlement of this kind. Mrs. Martin regretted that it was so; and I will assume that nothing could be more right than the feeling she entertained on the subject. They seem to have said: "We have now five children, the eldest will be twenty-one in a little more than twelve months; suppose an appointment is made to her entirely under a condition that she shall hand over one-half to the husband, and give him a life-interest in the other half; and as to the other four children, they will have nothing." I do not blame them for having this idea in their minds; they were not aware of the moral rule which exists in courts of equity, as to the exercise of powers. They never communicated with the daughter on the subject till after the death of Mrs. Martin. She was in a bad state of health, and it was arranged that Mr. Martin should go over from Brussels to England and I

- A consult their legal adviser. He, of course, advised that what they wished could not be done. Then the husband suggested that, still, the appointment might be made to the daughter absolutely. He then intended to communicate to her what had been the object of the appointment, and that if she thought fit she might give him the benefit contemplated; which I will assume was a very legitimate design. This was not an appointment made because the daughter was going to be married, or
- B anything of that kind; the whole purpose was for the benefit of Mr. Martin. There was no concealment about it, but there was clear evidence of what was the design of Mr. Martin and also of Mrs. Martin: viz., that it was her intention to exercise the power so as to defeat the real purpose of the power. The exercise of the power by Mrs. Martin in the mode suggested was an exercise that defeated the interests of the real objects of the power.
- C I am satisfied that this case comes within what is called a fraud upon the power, not imputing any bad motives to the parties; but it is clearly contrary to the scope of the power. In some of the cases it has been a bargain under which the donee of the power was to derive a benefit—that is something more than a moral fraud—but there is nothing of the kind here. It is not necessary that the appointee should be aware of the appointment; Lady Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington (1) shows that.
- D Nor is it necessary to constitute fraud that the object of the donee should be to benefit himself alone, because, if he wishes to benefit another person not the object of the power, it is just the same; as, for instance, if a man stipulated to have an interest given to his wife. It appears to me that it is not necessary that an appointee should be aware of the intention; but it is necessary that the motives should be matter of proof. I must decide that the execution of this appointment
- E is void, as being in fraud of the power; and, therefore, I cannot grant the prayer of this petition.

Petition dismissed.

Rule Nisi to quash an order made by one of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates on Nov. 9, 1848, adjudging the defendant to be the putative father of a bastard child born of Barbe Sophie Mertz, and ordering the defendant to pay her, or other person as in the order mentioned, certain sums of money therein specified; and also an order made by Middlesex Sessions in January, 1849, confirming the magistrate's order. Both orders had been removed by certiorari into Court of Queen's Bench.

It appeared that B. S. Mertz was a single woman, a native of France, who had come to England in 1835, and had resided continually in London until March, 1848. During that time, with the exception of a few months, she had served as an apprentice and afterwards as assistant to a milliner. In March, 1848, being then pregnant and near her confinement, she went to France for the purpose of her confinement and with the intention of returning to London as soon as possible. She was delivered, in France, of a child of which she alleged the defendant to be the father, and returned to London in April, 1848.

J. H. Parry and J. Brown showed cause against the rule.

Pashley and Maynard were not called on to support the rule.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Assuming that the magistrate who made this order has examined the law of France, and ascertained that, according to that law, the child is a bastard, we are clearly of opinion that children born out of this country are not the subject of our bastardy laws. I will only add that the principles of humanity are not concerned in this decision; for every destitute person in this country has a right to maintenance as casual poor. This great principle was broadly laid down by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in R. v. Eastbourne (Inhabitants) (1) (4 East. at p. 107).

COLERIDGE, J.—The provisions in the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, respecting bastardy have, certainly, modified the old law on the subject in many important particulars; but the foundation of the former system remains. The burden cast on parishes by the birth of bastard children was the foundation of that system; and the object was to relieve parishes from that burden. The bastardy provisions in the earlier statutes are referable to the birth in some parish; and, when it is said, in s. 71 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834,

“that every child which shall be born a bastard after the passing of this Act shall have and follow the settlement of the mother of such child, until such child shall attain the age of sixteen,”

there is a clear reference to the former system. The legislature in all these statutes is obviously dealing with bastards born in some parish; that is, in this country. The word “bastard,” therefore, has always been used by the legislature in a sense known to our law, and as denoting all the incidents which belong to the status of bastardy according to our law. If the word “bastard” is, on the other hand, to comprehend any bastard born in any part of the world, an immense field of inquiry must be traversed respecting the status of children according to the different laws of different countries. On this ground, I am of opinion that this order is bad.

A There may be two sides to the question of policy and humanity which have been touched on in the argument; but I have yet to learn that it is the duty of courts of law to enter on such an inquiry.

ERLE, J.—It is our duty to quash these orders. It is quite clear that our statutes relating to bastardy never contemplated the case of a child born a bastard

GRAVES v. LEGG AND ANOTHER

D [COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Pollock, C.B., Parke, Platt and Martin, BB.), May 3, 9, 1854]

[Reported 9 Exch. 709; 2 C.L.R. 1266; 23 L.J.Ex. 228;
23 L.T.O.S. 254]

E Sale of Goods—Rejection—Breach of condition—Condition precedent—Notification of name of ship in which goods shipped—Neglect to notify within reasonable time.

F By an agreement in writing the plaintiff contracted to sell and the defendants to buy 300 to 350 bales of wool of specified quality, to arrive at Liverpool, Hull, or London, deliverable at Odessa during August then next, to be shipped with all dispatch, etc., "the name of the ship to be declared as soon as the wool is shipped." The wool was shipped during August and arrived at Liverpool in November, and the plaintiff claimed damages for breach of the contract by the defendants' refusal to accept or pay for any part of the wool. The defendants pleaded that they agreed to buy the wool for re-sale, and, as the value fluctuated with the market, they could only re-sell the wool when they had notice of its shipment and the name of the ship in which the wool was shipped in accordance with the terms of the contract, but that the plaintiff had not notified the defendants of the name of the ship as soon as the wool was shipped, but had delayed to do so for a long and unreasonable time and before the defendants had such notice the price had fallen in the market.

H Held: the provision in the contract that the name of the ship in which the wool was shipped should be notified as soon as the wool was shipped was a condition precedent to the defendants' obligation to accept and pay for the wool, and, therefore, the defendants' plea was good.

Notes. The Sale of Goods Act, 1893, provides, by s. 11, when a condition is to be treated as a warranty and, by s. 50, the buyer's remedy in such case: see 22 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 99, 1014, respectively.

Demurrer in an action for breach of contract by the defendants' refusal to accept or pay for any part of certain bales of wool in accordance with the terms of the contract.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff agreed to sell to the defendants, and the defendants agreed to buy of the plaintiff, about 300 or 350 bales whitewashed Douskoy fleece wool, to arrive, at 10½d. per pound, laid down either at Liverpool, Hull, or London, deliverable at Odessa during August then next, old style, to be shipped with all dispatch, warranted fair average quality, but should they prove otherwise, to be taken with a fair allowance, which it was mutually agreed between buyer and seller should be assessed by Messrs. Hughes and Ronald, subject to the safe arrival of the wool in good condition at any of the ports stated, and the names of the ships to be declared as soon as the wool was shipped, customary allowances, payment cash in fourteen days, less £1 10s. per cent. discount, from the date of finishing loading, which agreement being made afterwards, the wool, being 333 bales of wool of the quality and description in the agreement mentioned, was during the month of August, old style, delivered, by the growers thereof at Odessa, to the agents of the plaintiff in that behalf, and was with all dispatch then shipped there on board a ship, called the Science, which then sailed from Odessa with the wool on board and afterwards, on Nov. 22, 1853, arrived at Liverpool with the wool on board, safe and in good condition, and according to the terms of the contract; averment of notice to the defendants, and of the lapse of reasonable time after arrival, and of performance by the plaintiff of all conditions. Breach, that the defendants would not accept or pay for the wools or any part thereof. E

The defendants pleaded that they agreed with the plaintiff to buy the wool for the purpose of re-selling it in the way of the defendants' trade and business of wool dealers, and thereby acquiring gains and profits, that wool is an article that fluctuates greatly in price in the market, and that the defendants could only re-sell the wool when, and not before, the defendants had notice of its being shipped, and when, and not before, the name of the ship in which it was so shipped had been declared according to the contract which the plaintiff at the time of making of the agreement had notice; and the defendants further said that, although the plaintiff had such notice, yet the plaintiff did not declare to the defendants, or either of them, the name of the ship in which the wool was shipped at or within the time at or within which the plaintiff was by the agreement bound to declare, that is to say, as soon as such wool was so shipped, but omitted so to do, and delayed and omitted so to declare the name of the ship in which the wool was so shipped, or F

A to give the defendants any notice of its being so shipped for a long and unreasonable time after it had been so shipped; and the defendants had not notice of the shipment of the wool, or of the name of the ship in which it had been so shipped, until after the expiration of a long and unreasonable time after it had been so shipped, and that after the plaintiff was bound to and ought to have given and declared it, and ought and could have done so; and the defendants further said that between
 B the time that the name of the ship ought to have been declared, according to the agreement, and the time when it was first declared to the defendants or when they first had any notice of the ship having sailed with the wool on board thereof, the price of wool in the market had greatly fallen, and the wool thence continually remained so fallen in price, and that the wool, when the name of the ship was first declared and when the defendants first had notice or knowledge of its having
 C been so shipped, would sell or could be sold only for a much less sum of money than it would have done at the time when the plaintiff ought to and could have declared the name of the ship, or given the defendants such notice; wherefore the defendants did not nor would accept or pay for the wool.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 9, 1854. PARKE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—In this case, the question raised by these pleadings is whether the provision that the names of the vessels should be declared as soon as the wools were shipped was a condition precedent to the defendants' obligation to accept and pay for the wools according to the contract stated in the declaration, and under the circumstances stated in the plea. This contract, we think, is to be construed with reference to some of those circumstances. It is stated in the plea that the wool was bought, with the knowledge of both parties, for the purpose of re-selling in the course of the defendants' business; that it is an article of fluctuating value, and not saleable until the names of the vessels in which it was shipped should have been declared according to the contract. The declaration having averred, according to s. 57 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 [repealed], the performance of conditions precedent generally, the defendants proceed in this plea to specify this condition of declaring the names of the vessels as one on the breach of which they insist. The loss which they aver to have sustained by that breach is immaterial. The only
 F question is whether the performance of the agreement was a condition precedent or not to the defendants' contract to accept and pay for the goods.

In the numerous cases on the subject in which it has been laid down that the general rule is to construe covenants and agreements to be dependent or independent according to the intent and meaning of the parties to be collected from the instrument, and of course to the circumstances legally admissible in evidence, with reference to which it is to be construed, one particular rule well acknowledged is, that where a covenant or agreement goes to part of the consideration on both sides, and may be compensated in damages, it is an independent covenant or contract, and an action might be brought for the breach of it, without averring performance in the declaration under the old system of pleading, and under the new the denial of such performance would be bad; and Campbell v. Jones (1) and Boone v. Eyre (2) are instances of the application of the rule. But then it appears, as MR. SERJ. WILLIAMS observes, in Pordage v. Cole (3) (1 Wms. Saund. at pp. 320 d, 320 e) and POLLOCK, C.B., in delivering the judgment of this court in Ellen v. Topp (4), adopts the observation:

"The reason of the decision in these and other similar cases, besides the inequality of the damages, seems to be, that where a person has received part of the consideration for which he entered into the agreement, it would be unjust that because he had not the whole, he should, therefore, be permitted to enjoy that part without either payment or doing anything for it. Therefore, the law obliges him to perform the agreement on his part, leaving him to his remedy to recover any damage he may have sustained in not having received the whole consideration."

He goes on to observe that it must appear upon the record that the consideration was executed in part. This may appear by the instrument declared on itself, whereby a valuable right, part of the consideration, is conveyed, as in Campbell v. Jones (1), or Boone v. Eyre (2), or by averment in pleading. When that appears, it is no longer competent for the defendants to insist upon the non-performance of that which was originally a condition precedent; and this is more correctly expressed, than to say it was not a condition precedent at all.

In this case, if the stipulation that the names of the vessels should be stated as soon as the wools were shipped was originally a condition precedent, it is so still. No other benefit was taken under the contract itself as the consideration for the promise to pay the money, than the shipment and delivery of the goods by the named vessels, nor was any subsequently received by the acceptance of the goods, or any part thereof. After such acceptance, the defendants would have been bound to pay the price, or the residue of it, and could not have insisted on the neglect to name in due time; but if there had been any such neglect, they would nevertheless have had their remedy for the damage by cross-action on the contract to declare the names. In the state of things on this record, the simple question is whether this contract was originally a condition precedent or not. Looking at the nature of the contract, and the great importance of it, to the object with which the contract was entered into with the knowledge of both parties, we think it was a condition precedent, quite as much indeed as the shipping of the goods at Odessa with all dispatch after the end of August; and with respect to the shipment itself, counsel for the plaintiff did not venture to contend that the performance of the plaintiff's contract in that respect was not a condition precedent. The defendants, therefore, have a right to object to fulfil the contract on their part, as the plaintiff did not fulfil his, though they could no longer object to the plaintiff's non-performance, had they afterwards taken any benefit under the contract.

Judgment for defendants.

Will—Next-of-kin—Time for ascertainment of class—Death of person whose next-of-kin referred to in will.

"Next-of-kin" mean next-of-kin at the death of the party whose next-of-kin are spoken of in the will, so long as there is nothing in the will to make such a construction an absurdity.

Bequest of a fund on trust for T. for life with remainder to her children at twenty-one, but if T. died without issue "to pay or assign and transfer" the fund to P. if then living, but, if then dead, to the next-of-kin of P. in a legal course of distribution ex parte materna. T. died without issue after the death of P.

Held: the class of next-of-kin were to be ascertained at the death of P. and not at the death of T., and as at that date T. was next-of-kin ex parte materna, she was not excluded by being also next-of-kin ex parte paterna.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., reported 14 Beav. 94, on a construction summons to determine, whether the persons to take under the will, as next-of-kin of N. T. S. Ponting (the person mentioned in the will) were to be ascertained at his death or at the death of Mary Lucy Tuckey (the tenant for life) being the period of distribution of the fund; and if so ascertained at the death of N. T. S. Ponting, whether Mary Lucy Tuckey was entitled to take under the description of next-of-kin ex parte materna, notwithstanding that she was also next-of-kin ex parte paterna or whether the defendants, the Ashes, were entitled as coming within the description of next-of-kin ex parte materna alone. SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., held that the next-of-kin were to be ascertained at the death of N. T. S. Ponting and that Mary Lucy Tuckey became entitled to the fund as next-of-kin materna notwithstanding that she was also his next-of-kin paterna.

The testatrix, by her will in 1808, gave the residue of her stock in the Consolidated Bank Annuities to trustees, for the benefit of her grandniece, Mary Lucy Ponting, with a bequest over to Nicholas T. S. Ponting in case she died before twenty-six, or married. In 1810 the testatrix made a codicil to her will, whereby after reciting that Mary Lucy Ponting had since married John Tuckey, upon which event no separate provision had been made for her or her issue, she revoked the bequest of the stock, consisting of a fund of £4,316 three per cent. consols, and gave the same to trustees in trust for her grandniece, Mary Lucy Tuckey, for life, with remainder to her children at twenty-one; but in case she died without issue (which event happened), or they should all die before their shares became payable, then, upon trust, after the decease of Mary Lucy Tuckey, to pay, or assign, and transfer the stock unto her grand-nephew, Nicholas T. S. Ponting, if he should be then living; but if he should be then dead, then unto the next-of-kin of her grand-nephew, in a legal course of distribution ex parte materna.

The testatrix died in 1836. Nicholas T. S. Ponting died in 1836, leaving his sister Mary Lucy Tuckey, and some first cousins once removed, ex parte materna of the name of Ashe. Mary Lucy Tuckey died without issue in 1849, at which period the defendants, the Ashes, were the next-of-kin of N. T. S. Ponting.

The defendants, the Ashes, appealed.

Hobhouse for the plaintiffs, the executors taking no interest in the question.

Bethell and Lloyd for the personal representative of Mrs. Tuckey.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.J.—Neither of us entertains any doubt that SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., has come to a right conclusion on the construction of this will. It is very difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile all the cases on the subject; but the view that I take is, that with all this difference there is a great cardinal rule to be observed, as laid down by BURTON, J., in Warburton v. Loveland d. Ivie (1), with regard to the construction of statutes, namely, to adhere as closely as possible to the literal meaning of the words used. If we depart from this, we launch into a sea of difficulties which it is not easy to fathom. In the course of the argument I have been putting to myself various combinations of circumstances, as to which, if we could ask the testatrix in her grave what she intended, she would probably say that she had not contemplated them, but would nevertheless wish the words she had used to be adhered to. It is, however, useless to speculate on these mat-

A ters. The conclusion at which I arrive is, that the words "next-of-kin" mean next-of-kin at the death of the party whose next-of-kin are spoken of, and there is nothing in the will to make this construction absurd.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—I cannot go so far as to say that I entertain no doubt, but I think that the decision of SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., is correct.

Negligence—Occupier of land—Liability to trespasser—Reservoir seven yards from public footpath—Duty of owner to fence.

E

Where an excavation is made at some distance from the public way and a person falling into it would be a trespasser upon the owner's land before he reached it the owner will not be liable. The true test of legal liability is whether the excavation is substantially adjoining the public way.

F

The defendants owned a reservoir built on their land which was unfenced and more than seven yards from a public footpath. On May 22, 1858, T.H. walked along this footpath, but, instead of continuing along it, strayed off it by mistake on to the defendants' land, fell into the reservoir, and was drowned. In an action under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, the plaintiff, the widow and administratrix of T.H., alleged that the defendants were negligent in not having fenced off the reservoir.

G

Held: by straying off the public footpath, T.H. was a trespasser on the defendants' land before reaching the reservoir; as the reservoir did not substantially adjoin the footpath, the defendants were under no obligation to fence it; and, therefore, the action failed.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendants to enter verdict in an action for damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, brought by the plaintiff, the widow and administratrix of Thomas Hardcastle, alleging negligence against the defendants in not having fenced a reservoir on their land. D

On the night of May 22, 1858, Hardcastle left Rotherham to walk to Sheffield along an ancient footpath which led from the one place to the other, but instead of his taking a turning to the right and going over a bridge, it appeared that he must have continued to walk straight on and went into a reservoir, which was not fenced off, belonging to the defendants, and he was drowned. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants ought, and were bound, to have properly fenced off such reservoir to prevent accidents to passengers along the public footpath. The defendants denied that they were bound to fence off the reservoir, considering its position in reference to the footpath. E

At the trial at the Yorkshire Assizes, before MARTIN, B., the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £50 damages. Leave was reserved to move to set the verdict aside and enter a verdict for the defendants. A rule nisi was, accordingly, obtained by the defendants. F

Overend, Q.C., for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule.

Atherton, Q.C., and Cleasby for the defendants supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult. G

Jan. 21, 1859. MARTIN, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.— This was an action tried before me at the last assizes for Yorkshire. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendants had leave to move to enter the verdict for them upon the traverse of an averment in the declaration that the defendants were bound to fence a reservoir mentioned therein. The parties had also leave to amend the pleadings, and the plaintiff, before the argument upon the rule obtained by the defendants to enter the verdict for them, made an amendment. It is material to refer to it, because we think that, not only upon the traverse but upon the facts of the case, as proved at the trial, the defendants are entitled to our judgment. H

The plaintiff was the widow and administratrix of Thomas Hardcastle, who was drowned on May 22, 1858; the defendants are the proprietors of a navigation called the Dun Navigation. On the night of May 22, 1858, the intestate left Rotherham to walk to Sheffield, but was drowned in the place hereafter described. The action was brought against the defendants under Lord Campbell's Act [Fatal Accidents, 1846]. The defendants' predecessors were the proprietors of the navigation, and about twenty-four years ago they made a new cut, which consisted of a large reservoir, out of which there were two branches, one a canal for the boats to navigate I

A on, and the other was for the water to flow away. The division between these two branches was a buttress or projecting wall; the water for the canal passing on the one side, the water going through the bye-wash passing on the other. There was an ancient footpath from Rotherham to Sheffield, which passed along the bye-wash, was continued over it by a bridge, and then proceeded to Sheffield. The bridge was from seven to ten yards from the end of the buttress or projecting wall, and a person who continued to walk straight up the pathway along the bye-wash, and who did not turn a little way to the right in order to go over the bridge, would, unless prevented by the arm of a gate to a lock upon the canal gate, come upon a grass spot; and if he continued walking on would go over the buttress or projecting wall into the reservoir.

C It was assumed on both sides that the intestate had walked up the footway along the bye-wash, and then, instead of turning to the right and going over the bridge, continued to walk straight on, and went into the reservoir at the end of the buttress, and was drowned. At the trial a statement was made that the course of the way had been altered when the new cut was made; but no evidence was given of this, nor, indeed, in the course of the action alleged in the declaration founded upon it, and, after such a lapse of time, we think it must be taken that the present way is the lawful one. The authority relied on by the plaintiff was Barnes v. Ward (1), and with the judgment in that case we entirely concur. The facts there were, that the defendant, being possessed of land abutting on a public footway, excavated an area in the course of building a house immediately adjoining the footway, and left it unprotected, and a person walking in the night time fell in and was killed. The court held the defendant was liable; the principle of that decision was, that such an excavation was a public nuisance, and that an individual injury arising from such a nuisance was the subject-matter of an action to the party aggrieved.

F That private injury arising from a public nuisance is the subject-matter of an action for damages, is a doctrine as old as any in the common law, and we were of opinion that the state of the reservoir in the present case was a nuisance to the footpath, and that the plaintiff was substantially in the right, notwithstanding that we thought the terms of the declaration were defective, and that there was no such obligation to fence as is therein alleged. We should be desirous to aid the plaintiff, but we are of opinion that she has no right of action against the defendants. When an excavation is made adjoining to a public way, so that a person walking on it might, by making a false step, or being affected with sudden giddiness, or in the case of a horse or carriage, who might by the sudden starting of a horse be thrown into the excavation, it is reasonable that the person making such excavation should be liable for the consequences. But when the excavation is made at some distance from the way, and the person falling into it would be a trespasser upon the defendant's land before he reached it, the case seems to us to be different. We do not see where the liability is to stop. A man going off a road on a dark night, and losing his way, may wander to any extent; and, if the question be for the jury, no one can tell whether he was liable for the consequences of his acts upon his own land or not.

H We think the proper and true test of legal liability is whether the excavation be substantially adjoining the way, and it would be very dangerous if it were otherwise, and in every case it was to be left as a fact to the jury whether the excavation was sufficiently near to the highway to be dangerous. When a man dedicates a way to the public, there does not seem any just grounds in reason and good sense that he should restrict himself in the use of his land adjoining to any extent further than that he should not make the use of the way dangerous to the persons who are upon it and using it. To do so would be derogating from his grant; but he gives no liberty or licence to the persons using the way to trespass upon his adjoining land, and may in so doing come to misfortune; we think they must bear it, and the owner of the land is not responsible. If fences are to be put up, it would seem more reasonable they should be put up by those who use the way, or those who are under the obligation to repair it, than by the person who dedicates it to the public.

or his successors; and as we are clearly of opinion that there is no such obligation to fence as alleged in the declaration, and also that upon the above state of facts there is no liability, our judgment is in accordance with the principle of Blyth v. Topham (2) which, we think, is the true one. The rule to enter a verdict for the defendants must, therefore, be made absolute.

Rule absolute. B

GULLIVER v. COSENS

[COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (Tindal, C.J., Coltman, Maule and Cresswell, JJ.), May 31, 1845]

[Reported 1 C.B. 788; 14 L.J.C.P. 215; 5 L.T.O.S. 199;
9 Jur. 666; 135 E.R. 753]

Animal—Cattle straying—Distress damage feasant—Tender of amends—Excessive demand by distrainer—Payment by owner under protest without previous tender—Recovery of excess—Form of action.

A party whose cattle have trespassed is, in the first instance, a wrongdoer, and the risk of estimating the amount of the damage rests on him and not on the party who has suffered by the trespass. If the owner of the cattle elects to make a sufficient tender before the distress and the distrainer refuses it, the latter becomes a wrongdoer, but a tender after distress does not entitle the owner to replevy the cattle. E

Where cattle are seized for distress damage feasant, the owner should make a sufficient tender, but if he fails to do so and pays, under protest, an excessive demand by the distrainer for the damage, he cannot recover the excess amount in an action for money had and received to his use. Where a sufficient tender is made by the owner before the distress his remedy is in detinue, but after the distress his remedy is in detinue upon a tender before the impounding. F

The defendant distrained cattle belonging to the plaintiff as damage feasant and demanded £2 15s. 9d. for their release. This sum was the defendant's estimate of the damage suffered, but was an excessive demand as the actual damage was 5s. The plaintiff, without making a previous tender, paid the £2 15s. 9d. under protest and sought to recover the excess amount of £2 10s. 9d. in an action for money had and received. G

Held: the action was not maintainable as the plaintiff's remedy lay in detinue after a tender before the impounding. H

E Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiff to enter verdict in his favour for £2 10s. 9d. in an action for money had and received by the defendant to the plaintiff's use. The plaintiff had paid, under protest, £2 15s. 9d. which was the defendant's estimate of the damage suffered. The defendant pleaded nunquam indebitatus. At the trial at the Sussex Assizes, the jury found that the actual damage suffered was 5s. and ALDERSON, B., directed a nonsuit, with leave to the plaintiff to enter verdict in his favour and subsequently the plaintiff obtained a rule nisi accordingly.

F A flock of sheep belonging to the plaintiff had strayed on to the defendant's land and were seized for distress damage feasant by the defendant who refused to restore them except on payment of £2 15s. 9d., which was the defendant's estimate of the damage done by the sheep. The plaintiff paid the £2 15s. 9d. under protest. The actual damage was found to be 5s., and the plaintiff sought to recover the excess £2 10s. 9d. in an action for money had and received. The defendant contended that an action for money had and received was not maintainable and that where an exorbitant demand was made for compensation the only remedy was replevin.

G Serjeant Channell and Johnson, for the defendant, showed cause against the rule.
Serjeant Dowling and Bovill, for the plaintiff, supported the rule.

H TINDAL, C.J.—I am of opinion that the rule, that has been obtained in this case, to enter a verdict for the plaintiff, ought to be discharged. The question at issue seems to me to depend upon the consideration on which of the parties has the law cast the onus of estimating the amount of damage done to the owner of the land. The party whose sheep have trespassed is, in the first instance, the wrongdoer; it is, therefore, upon him that the risk of estimating the amount of damage ought to rest, and not upon the party who has suffered by the trespass. If the owner of the cattle elects to make a tender of sufficient amends before the distress, and the distrainer refuses it, the latter becomes a wrongdoer, but a tender after distress does not entitle the owner to replevy his cattle.

I The rule of law cannot be more clearly stated than is done by LORD COKE, C.J., in The Six Carpenters' Case (1) (8 Co. Rep. at p. 147a):

"Vide the book in 30 Ass., fo. 179, pl. 38, John Matrever's case: it is held by the court, that, if the lord, or his bailiff, comes to distrain, and, before the distress, the tenant tenders the arrears upon the land, there the distress taken for it, is tortious. The same law for damage feasant, if, before the distress, he tenders sufficient amends; and therewith agrees Y.B. 7 Edw. 3, fo. 8, pl. 17, in the matter of St. Mark's case; and so is the opinion of HULL to be understood, in Y.B. 13 Hen. 4, fo. 17, pl. 14, which opinion is not well abridged in [FITZHERBERT'S ABRIDGMENT] title TRESPASS, pl. 180. Note, reader, this difference, that tender upon the land before the distress, makes the distress tortious; tender after the distress, and before the impounding, makes the detainer, and not the taking, wrongful: tender after the impounding makes neither the one nor the other wrongful; for, then it comes too late, because then the cause is put to the trial of the law, to be there determined. But, after the law has determined it, and the avowment has return irreplevisable, yet, if the plaintiff makes him a sufficient tender, he may have an action of detinue for the detainer after, or he may, upon satisfaction made in court, have a writ for the re-delivery of his goods."

It appears to me, that, when the present plaintiff found he was too late to make a tender, so as to entitle himself to replevy the sheep and to succeed in an action of replevin, his proper course was, to make a tender of sufficient amends to cover the damage sustained; and, in the event of the defendant refusing to accept the sum tendered, and deliver up the sheep, he should have brought detinue; for they were held by the defendant merely as a pledge. In that case, the hazard of the sufficiency of the tender would fall, as it ought to do, on the owner of the cattle.

It has been urged that here a tender was unnecessary, inasmuch as the sum demanded for compensation was exorbitant. That argument, however, as it seems to me, is answered by saying that the risk of determining the real amount of damage, is not by law imposed upon the defendant. This I should be disposed to hold upon principle, and independently of the authority of Lindon v. Hooper (2), which I am unable to get over, and which I am not aware has been overruled; and, though cases have occurred in which it has been decided that an excessive demand dispenses with a tender, yet those were cases where the law made it incumbent on the defendant correctly to ascertain the amount of his demand. Barrett v. Stockton and Darlington Rail. Co. (3) and Parker v. Great Western Rail. Co. (4) range themselves within this class. Knibbs v. Hall (5) and Skeate v. Beale (6) follow the doctrine of Lindon v. Hooper (2). Upon authority, therefore, as well as upon principle, I am of opinion that the verdict which has been entered for the defendant, ought to stand.

COLTMAN, J.—I also think the law has, with sufficient distinctness, pointed out the course which the plaintiff ought to have pursued. And, if he has brought a difficulty upon himself by departing from that course, he has no right to complain. The objection to bringing an action for money had and received, instead of tendering amends and replevying, is that which has been stated by TINDAL, C.J., namely, that it would remove from the owner of the cattle the burthen of ascertaining the precise amount of compensation due, and cast it upon the other party, who, in the absence of a tender, is no wrongdoer. The case differs essentially from that of Parker v. Great Western Rail. Co. (4). There, the company, by refusing to carry the plaintiff's goods, without being paid an exorbitant sum, in contravention of the provisions of the acts of parliament by which their concerns are regulated, became wrongdoers. Nor can it be said that in this case the money was extorted by duress. Duress of goods implies an unlawful detention of them, which has not occurred here, the sheep having been lawfully taken. I am unable to distinguish the present case from Lindon v. Hooper (2), and I know of nothing to prevent its being treated as a subsisting authority. For these reasons, I think the rule should be discharged.

MAULE, J.—I also am of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, money had and received is not the proper form of action. The defendant had an undoubted right to distrain the plaintiff's sheep, and to keep them until the damage

A done was satisfied. If a sufficient tender had been made before the impounding, the defendant would have been bound to restore them; otherwise not. The question is, whose duty it is to ascertain the amount of damage sustained. If that duty were by law cast upon the distrainer, it would manifestly be throwing a very inconvenient burthen upon the innocent party. It seems to me to be quite clear that this duty rests upon the party who inflicts, and not upon him who suffers, the injury. That
B being so, the defendant is not a wrongdoer because he may have too highly estimated the compensation due to him.

It is said that the plaintiff ought to be permitted to maintain this action, because he is, under the circumstances, precluded from bringing a replevin. The reason why he has not that remedy, is, that he has sustained no wrong. His proper course was, to make a tender of sufficient amends; and, if the defendant, upon such tender,
C refused to restore the sheep, to bring an action of detainue, as suggested by LORD COKE, C.J., in The Six Carpenters' Case (1). Anscomb v. Shore (7)—where it was held that an action on the case lay not for the detention of the goods after a tender made of sufficient amends—goes very far to show that money had and received is not maintainable in this case; inasmuch as it shows that the distrainer was not a wrongdoer.

D CRESSWELL, J.—The plaintiff in this case has brought an action for money had and received by the defendant to his use. The defendant, in answer, says, the payment was made voluntarily, with full knowledge of all the facts, and therefore it is not recoverable back. On the part of the plaintiff it is suggested that the payment was made under a species of duress—a wrongful detainer of his sheep. According to the rule laid down in The Six Carpenters' Case (1) it appears that there
E has been no such wrongful detainer of the plaintiff's sheep. That ground therefore fails. The payment appears to me to have been made for the purpose of avoiding all question or dispute as to the right to distrain. The plaintiff cannot, therefore, now turn round and recover back the money which he so paid upon an adequate consideration.

Rule discharged.

Distress—For rent—Illegal distress—Seizure of weaver's looms in work—Other goods sufficient to satisfy rent due—Damages—Measure.

A landlord distrained for rent due, and among other goods seized some looms then at work which belonged to the tenant, who was a weaver. The looms were not distrainable in law as there was sufficient without them to satisfy the rent due. The tenant paid the amount of the rent and the costs of the distress in order to redeem the goods. In an action by the tenant for trespass for unlawful seizure of his goods,

Held: the landlord was a trespasser ab initio only as to the goods which were not distrainable, and the tenant was entitled to nominal damages only and not to the whole amount paid by him to redeem the goods.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendants for a new trial or a reduction of damages to 15s. or to 1s., in an action for trespass brought by the plaintiff, the tenant against the defendants, the landlord and his agents, for breaking and entering the plaintiff's dwelling house distraining for £8 rent due his goods, including six looms in work (there being sufficient without them to satisfy the rent) and impounding them until the plaintiff was obliged to pay £8 and 15s. 6d. costs, in order to release his goods. The defendants pleaded s. 19 of the Distress For Rent Act, 1737.

At the trial GURNEY, B., directed the jury that the distraining of the looms entitled the plaintiff to a verdict for the value of the goods so taken and, as no damage had been proved, it was for the jury to say whether the plaintiff should be awarded

A any greater damages than the amount the plaintiff had paid to redeem his goods. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff and awarded £8 15s. 6d. damages. Subsequently the defendants obtained a rule nisi for a new trial or a reduction of damages to 15s. 6d. or a nominal 1s.

B The defendants' distress was made for £8 due from the plaintiff, who was a willow-weaver, for rent of the house and premises occupied by him. Among the goods included in the inventory were six looms then at work, and without which there was sufficient on the premises to satisfy the distress. Nothing was removed, nor was any injury whatever done to any of the goods. The defendants remained in possession for five days, when the plaintiff paid the rent due, together with 15s. 6d. for costs, and the distress was withdrawn.

C Jervis and E. James for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule.
Kelly and Hugh Hill for the defendants supported the rule.

LORD ABINGER, C.B.—Dod v. Monger (1) is undoubtedly a very strong authority for the defendants. The Six Carpenters' Case (2) leaves it an open question how far the party becomes a trespasser ab initio as to the whole distress by an excess as to part. It is very reasonable that he should not, but that his liability should be limited according to the doctrine laid down by LORD HOLT, C.J., in Dod v. Monger (1). This is only a constructive trespass as to the looms, and yet the plaintiff is asking for damages to the amount of the whole rent. It is the same as if the goods had been sold, and the value of the looms had been returned to him. The rule will be absolute for a new trial, unless the plaintiff consents to reduce the verdict to nominal damages.

E GURNEY and ROLFE, BB., concurred.

Rule absolute for a new trial.

H Breach of Promise—Promise to marry by married man—Consideration—Action by promisee—Competency.

In an action for breach of promise of marriage the plaintiff said that in consideration of her promising to marry the defendant he promised to marry her, that accordingly she remained unmarried and had always been ready and willing to marry him, but that he had failed to marry her and at the time of making the promise and thenceforward had been married to another woman.

I Held: although the plaintiff was never bound by her promise to marry the defendant, he being married at all material times, her promise involved a further promise that she would remain single for a reasonable time, and that constituted a sufficient consideration to entitle her to sue on the contract and recover damages for its breach.

Application by the defendant for a rule nisi to arrest judgment in an action of assumpsit for breach of promise of marriage.

The declaration stated that in consideration that the plaintiff, being sole and unmarried, at the request of the defendant had promised to marry him within a reasonable time, he, the defendant, then promised to marry her within a reasonable time. Confiding in this promise the plaintiff had remained unmarried and, until she had notice that the defendant was married, ready and willing to marry him. She said that, although a reasonable time had elapsed since the making of the defendant's promise, and before the commencement of the suit, yet he had wholly neglected his promise and had not married her, but, on the contrary, at the time of making his promise and from thenceforward, he had been married to a woman whose name was unknown to the plaintiff. At the trial, before MAULE, J., a verdict was found for the plaintiff, damages £10.

Huddlestone, for the defendant, moved for a rule nisi to arrest judgment.

June 12, 1849. WILDE, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.— This was a motion in arrest of judgment. The action was for breach of promise of marriage, and the declaration stated that, in consideration that the plaintiff, being sole and unmarried, at the request of the defendant, promised to marry him within a reasonable time, he promised to marry her within a reasonable time. It went on to aver that the plaintiff remained sole and unmarried and had always been ready and willing to marry the defendant, but that he disregarded his promise, and at the time of making his promise, and from thenceforward, was and continued married, and that the plaintiff was ignorant of the defendant's marriage at the time of the making of his promise.

On behalf of the defendant it has been contended that, inasmuch as the declaration discloses that he was a married man at the time of the making of the alleged promise—so that the plaintiff was not bound by her promise to marry the defendant—there was a total absence of consideration. But the declaration alleges a promise by the plaintiff to marry the defendant within a reasonable time, which involves within it a promise to remain single for a reasonable time, and this the plaintiff avers that she did do. That is consideration enough. The defendant's promise to marry the plaintiff within a reasonable time was not absolutely impossible of performance, for, his wife might have died within a reasonable time, and so he would have been in a condition to perform his promise to the plaintiff.

The authority referred to by my brother CRESSWELL in the course of the argument—BROOKE'S ABRIDGMENT, tit. CONDITIONS, pl. 119—seems to recognise the principle which must govern this case. There a woman infeoffed a man upon condition that he (being then a married man) should marry her within a reasonable time. The feoffee infeoffed another person, and he another, and so on. The man died, being still married, whereupon the original feoffor entered as for condition broken, and it was held that it was a lawful condition, for the feoffee's wife might

A have died within a reasonable time. It would be strange, indeed, to allow the defendant to rely upon his own wrong—to set up his fraudulent concealment of his marriage—in order to discharge himself from his promise, the plaintiff having performed her part of the consideration by remaining unmarried and ready to marry the defendant, until she discovered that he was already a married man. We, therefore, think there is no ground for this application.

By letters patent granted by Charles I, a weekly market and two fairs at E., with certain tolls and profits, were granted to one G.H. and his heirs, through whom the plaintiff claimed. By a deed of 1646, made between G.H., of the one part, and four persons therein described as yeomen and byelaw men for the year 1646 for the township of E. on the behalf of themselves and all the inhabitants of E. aforesaid mentioned in the schedule thereto annexed, of the other part, the byelaw men and inhabitants granted to G.H. his heirs and assigns the market-place at E., and G.H. covenanted that the byelaw men and the rest of the inhabitants, their heirs and assigns for ever, should have a free market within the town of E. to buy and sell all cattle and commodities, toll free, in as ample a manner as G.H. had by the letters patent. It was proved that the plaintiff was seized in fee of the freehold of the market-place, and that the defendant was an inhabitant of E., but it was not shown that he was either the heir or assignee of any of the grantees named in the schedule. The plaintiff claimed stallage, but the defendant contended that he was entitled under the deed of 1646 to place his stall on market days on the plaintiff's land without making any payment.

Held: the exemption from tolls mentioned in the deed of 1646 included an exemption from stallage also; the inhabitants, qua inhabitants, of a town could not take an easement in alieno solo, or claim such a right under a modern grant not made by the Crown, such a claim as the inhabitants were making, where it had been allowed, having invariably rested on the ground of a custom which had existed from time immemorial, without interruption, in a certain place, was certain and reasonable in itself, and had obtained the force of law and was in effect the common law within the place in which it extended, though contrary to the general law of the realm; the defendant, therefore, could not, as an inhabitant of E., claim exemption from stallage under the deed of 1646.

Shelton v. Montague (1616), Hob. 118.

Bill of Exceptions tendered by the plaintiff to a ruling of DENMAN, C.J., directing a jury to dismiss his claim against the defendant for stallage dues which, the plaintiff claimed, were due to him as proprietor of a market at Easingwold. H

At the trial of the action at the Yorkshire Summer Assizes, 1842, the plaintiff declared in debt for stallage dues, due and payable to him as the proprietor of a certain market and market-place in the county of York; to which declaration the defendant pleaded the plea of never indebted. The plaintiff gave evidence, among other things, of a grant by King Charles I, in the fifteenth year of his reign, to one George Hall and his heirs, of a weekly market and two fairs in the year, at Easingwold, in the county of York, with certain special tolls and profits. He also proved the seizin in fee of the plaintiff in the said market and fairs, and the tolls and profits thereof; and the seizin of the plaintiff in his demesne as of fee of the soil and freehold of the market-place at Easingwold, and the user of the market by the defendant, by placing a stall upon the market-place on several market-days, the defendant being, as proved by the plaintiff, an inhabitant of the town of Easingwold. I

A The defendant gave in evidence a deed, bearing date Aug. 31, 1646, being made between George Hall, the grantee of the said market, of the one part, and four persons therein named of the other part, who were therein described as of Easingwold :

B "yeoman and byelaw men for the present year (1646) for the said township of Easingwold, on the behalf of themselves and all the inhabitants of Easingwold aforesaid, mentioned in the schedule thereunto annexed, by and with the consent and appointment of all the inhabitants of Easingwold aforesaid;"

C the schedule thereto annexed was headed with the words "Inhabitants of Easingwold," and contained considerably more than 100 names subjoined thereto. By that deed, the four byelaw men, and the rest of the inhabitants, gave and granted to George Hall, his heirs and assigns, for ever, among other things, the market-place at Easingwold, as described therein by certain metes and bounds; and George Hall thereby covenanted among other things, that the four byelaw men,

D "and the rest of the inhabitants aforesaid, their heirs and assigns for ever, shall have a free market within the said town of Easingwold, to buy and sell all cattle and commodities whatsoever toll free, in as ample a manner and form as the said George Hall hath by the recited letters patent."

There was on the back of the deed an endorsement of livery of seizin having been given to George Hall, of the premises described in the deed, by the four byelaw men, by and with the consent of the inhabitants therein named.

E The whole question raised before the court turned upon the legal effect and operation of that deed. At the trial, the defendant's counsel insisted that the deed and the other matters given in evidence amounted to a bar of the plaintiff's claim; while the plaintiff's counsel, on the other hand, insisted that the deed contained a grant of an exemption from tolls only, and not from stallage, and that stallage was not included in the terms of the grant; and further insisted, that even if stallage was included within the terms of the exemption, the defendant not being one of the grantees, nor the heir or assignee of any of the grantees therein named, could not take the benefit thereof as an inhabitant of Easingwold, as such inhabitants thereof were not incorporated; therefore, he contended the deed ought not to be admitted as a bar to the plaintiff's right of action. The Lord Chief Justice thereupon told the jury, he was of opinion that stallage was included within the terms of the exemption, and that the defendant, as an inhabitant of the township of Easingwold, was entitled to such exemption, and directed the jury that the deed and matters aforesaid were a bar to the plaintiff's action. The plaintiff's counsel then excepted to each of those points so ruled by the Lord Chief Justice, and the question is, whether such ruling, as to both those points, is or is not consistent with law.

Cur. adv. vult.

I April 23, 1844. TINDAL, C.J., delivered the judgment of the court in which after stating the facts as set out above, he continued: It is to be observed, that the present cause has been already, in a former stage of the proceedings, before the Court of Queen's Bench upon a motion for a new trial; and that upon the arguments brought before the court upon that occasion, the same two points were made by the counsel for the plaintiff below, which form the ground of the present exception; and that the Court of Queen's Bench, after time taken to consider, in a very learned judgment, in which the principal authorities are reviewed and discussed, declared their opinion upon the first point to be, that the exemption from toll mentioned in the deed included an exemption from stallage also; and after that judgment, it is unnecessary for us to say more than that we entirely concur therein, and in the reasoning by which it is supported; and consequently we hold that the exception, first tendered to the direction of the learned judge at the trial, is untenable. A

With regard to the second point, viz., whether the inhabitants of Easingwold could claim an exemption from stallage under the description contained in the deed, the Court of Queen's Bench appear to have studiously abstained from giving any opinion; and both that court and the Lord Chief Justice, at the trial, have been desirous that such questions should be put upon the record for the purpose of a more formal discussion, which has accordingly been done by the course taken at the trial; and we, therefore, proceed to consider this second ground of objection, as one which is altogether open and unfettered by the judgment of the court below. Upon this point we are of opinion that, under the grant in question, a modern grant, not made by the Crown, but by a subject, the inhabitants cannot take, by that name or description, such an easement as that which is now under consideration, that is, a right to place their stalls on market-days in alieno solo, without making any payment for the same. It was admitted, in the arguments before us, that the inhabitants cannot take land by that description in a modern deed; indeed the authority of Co. Litt., 3a, is express to that point, for, although it is added there, apparently by way of exception, "unless it were in ancient times when such grants were allowed," yet, that exception would probably be found to be confined to grants by the Crown, and to stand upon the reasons stated in DYER'S REPORTS, 100a, pl. 70, that if the Queen grants land by her charter to the good men of the town of Islington without saying, to have to them their heirs, and their successors, rendering a rent, this is a good corporation perpetual to that extent only, and no other, because there a rent was reserved, etc. B C D

But the argument on the part of the defendant is that the present grant is not a grant of land, but of an easement only, or of an exemption or discharge, and that such an easement or matter of discharge may be claimed by prescription; and that as every prescription presupposes a grant, so a prescription for such a grant to the inhabitants of a town would be good to this day. If, indeed, the present claim could be considered as confined to, and resting upon, the ground of exemption and discharge, strictly so considered, there might perhaps be some authority for contending that the inhabitants of a parish or vill might claim an exemption from toll by a modern grant, and that by a private individual. For all the judges held in Baker v. Brereman (1) that inhabitants may prescribe for matters of discharge, as in modo decimandi, or to be quit of toll: and again, so a composition toll might have been made by a private individual, that is, by a parson with the consent of the patron and ordinary in favour of all the inhabitants before the restraining statutes: see Bree v. Chaplin (2). So also it would seem that a private individual might grant an exemption from toll to the inhabitants at large, and it affords some support to this argument that the writ De essendo quietum de tolonio lay for persons by royal grant, who could not have been impliedly incorporated by such a grant, as merchant strangers: see FITZHERBERT'S NATURA BREVIVM, 227 d. E F G

But the claim in this case is not simply to be exempt from toll, properly so called, but from a species of payment, which although included in the word toll in the deed in question, in this case is a compensation for the use of land; and the true nature of the claim of the inhabitants under the deed, is a claim to the grant of the easement of going on the plaintiff's land, and pitching their stalls there on market days, without paying anything for the use of the soil; and, upon referring to the several authorities which have been cited in support of the validity of such a prescription, it will be found that the claim by the inhabitants, qua inhabitants, to any easement, wherever it has been allowed, has been invariably rested on the ground of custom, and not on that of prescription; a custom which has existed from time immemorial, without interruption, in a certain place, and which is certain and reasonable in itself, obtains the force of the law, and is in effect the common law within the place in which it extends, though contrary to the general law of the realm. In the case of custom, therefore, it is unnecessary to look out for its origin, but in the case of prescription, which founds itself on the presumption of a grant that has been H I

A lost by the process of time, none can have had a legal origin, where no grant could have been made to support it. Thus, the custom for all fishermen within a certain district to dry their nets on the land of another might be a good prescription; and yet a grant of such an easement to fishermen within the district eo nomine might well be held void.

B The first case on which the defendant's counsel relied in argument was Gatewood's Case (3). In that case, the claim was one by all the inhabitants of Hinxwold, to have a common of pasture over a place called Horsington Holmes; but this claim was set up, not as a prescription, but as a custom; and it was held that the custom was against law. LORD COKE goes on to state (6 Co. Rep. at p. 60 b):

C "But two differences were taken and agreed on by the whole court. 1. Between a charge on the soil of another and a discharge on his own soil. 2. Between an interest or profit, to be taken or had on another's soil, and an easement on another's soil."

D But it is to be observed that all the instances put are not those of prescriptions or grants, but of customs—viz. the custom that every inhabitant of the town has paid a modus decimandi—a custom that every inhabitant of such a town shall have a way over such land, either to the church or market, etc.; and those, it is said, are good, for they are an easement, and no profit. Further, LORD COKE says:

E "Another difference was taken and agreed, between a prescription which is always alleged in the person, and a custom which always ought to be alleged in the land; for every prescription ought to have by common intendment a lawful beginning, but otherwise it is of a custom, for that ought to be reasonable, and ex certâ causâ rationabili (as LITTLETON saith) usitata, but need not be intended to have a lawful beginning."

F A difference which points out clearly the distinction which ought to govern the present case—viz., that such an easement for the inhabitants of Easingwold as is contended for, although it might be good by custom if it existed from time immemorial, yet it cannot be good by prescription, but must rest upon the grant to the inhabitants.

G The report of the same case in Cro. Jac., 152, will not justify the inference contended for in the argument, that the claim to an easement for the inhabitants of a town is good by prescription, merely on the ground that the reporter has used the word prescription, instead of custom, contrary to what is found in the report in LORD COKE; the question before the court, in that case, turning on the custom, and not on the prescription, and the attention of the reporter not being called to the distinction now under consideration. The same observation disposes of the weight of the dictum of HEATH, J., in Fitch v. Rawling (4), in which case the question before the court arose on the claim by custom, and the attention of the court was not called to the distinction between custom and prescription. Abbot v. Weekly (5) is a strong authority that such a claim by prescription would be bad. In trespass, the defendant prescribed that all the inhabitants of such a vill had been used time out of mind to dance on the close of the plaintiff at all times for their recreation, and so justified; and after verdict for the defendant, one objection taken in arrest of judgment was, that the claim ought to have been pleaded by way of custom in the vill, and not by way of prescription in a person; a case was cited, where it had been so adjudged on demurrer, the court held that though perhaps it would have been bad upon demurrer, yet if issue be taken upon it, and found by the verdict, it was good. No direct authority has been cited to show that such a prescription was good, and upon our consideration of those that have been brought before us, we think they negative, rather than support, the position, that the inhabitants of the town may by that name "prescription," prescribe for an easement, in alieno solo; and if they cannot prescribe for such rights in alieno solo beyond the time of legal memory, still less can they claim such a right under a modern grant. On this ground we think that the exception secondly taken at the trial to the direction of the learned Lord Chief Justice must be allowed, and the judgment of the court below must on that ground be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

Venire de novo.

D Appeal from a decision of WIGRAM, V.-C.

The testator in the cause, Colonel Petrie, by his will dated July 18, 1843, after bequeathing several legacies, and having given an annuity to his widow for her life, gave all his residuary estate in the following terms :

E "I now desire, that my said trustees or trustee,—shall convert all and singular my investments in the stocks, funds, and other securities, into money, and do and shall pay such money, and all other trust moneys whatever, remaining not disposed of, after payment of all and every the legacies, bequests, donations, and sums of money aforesaid, and all expenses attending the execution of the trusts of this my will, to the Queen's Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being, and to be by him appropriated to the benefit and advantage of my beloved country, Great Britain."

F The testator's residuary estate, which consisted of pure personalty, amounted to £20,000 and a sum of £300 due upon mortgage. The Vice-Chancellor held the gift of the pure personalty to be a good charitable bequest, and from that decree the next-of-kin appealed.

G Romilly and Bell for the next-of-kin.
Twiss and Wray for the Attorney-General.

H Mar. 8, 1848. LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.—The question in this case is, whether a gift to the Queen's Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being, to be by him appropriated for the benefit of "my beloved country" of Great Britain is a valid charitable bequest. The decree applies to personalty only, and therefore the question is not affected by the Statute of Mortmain. If the bequest is valid it must be as a charitable gift. I find that in the cases cited in argument of A.-G. v. Brown (1), A.-G. v. Heelis (2), A.-G. v. Dublin Corpn. (3) and several other cases, bequests for the benefit of parishes, of towns, of counties, and of provinces, have been held to be valid as charitable gifts. So also in A.-G. v. Earl of Lonsdale (4), a gift for a school in Lonsdale, and for such other purposes as the executors should

I think conducive to the good of the county of Westmoreland, was held to be a good charitable legacy. In Mitford v. Reynolds (5), a bequest for the benefit of the town of Dacca was held to be valid. In other cases, as in Thellusson v. Woodford (6) and Newland v. A.-G. (7), effect was given to gifts in aid of the public revenue. It is no objection that the particular purposes to which the gift is to be applied are not specified, as appears from Newland v. A.-G. (7) and in Moggridge v. Thackwell (8), and why, therefore, should this gift be held to be void because the purposes are not specified. Morice v. Bishop of Durham (9) and the other cases that were cited in support of the argument, that the gift in this will could not be supported, as being too general in its terms, and not specific enough in its objects, are not applicable to this case. If, then, the gift to the government for public objects be good, a gift to one member of the government for public purposes must likewise be held to be good. Here a particular officer of the government is named, the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being, which obviates, in a great measure, the want of a specific direction as to the mode of applying the gift. It is clear the testator did not intend the gift for the Chancellor of the Exchequer's own use; but by selecting him the testator pointed out the direction for the application of the gift. I have no doubt that, upon the authorities which have been referred to, this is a good charitable gift, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Carriage of Passengers—Safety of passengers—Duty of care—Passenger trespasser in vehicle.

The plaintiff, a person of full age, contracted with the defendant to carry certain goods for her in his cart. The defendant sent his servant with the cart, and the plaintiff, by the permission of the servant, but without the defendant's authority, rode in the cart with her goods. On the way, the cart broke down, and the plaintiff was thrown out and injured:

Held: as the defendant had not contracted to carry the plaintiff and she had ridden in the cart without his authority, he was not liable for the injury which she had sustained.

Application by the plaintiff for a rule nisi to increase the amount of damages awarded in an action on the case for negligence.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff retained and employed the defendant for reward to the defendant in that behalf, to carry and convey in and by a cart of the defendant's goods and chattels of and for the plaintiff, to wit, from Carnaby

A Street, in the county of Middlesex, to New Inn Passage, in the county aforesaid; that the defendant accepted such retainer and employment, and then received and loaded the goods and chattels for the purposes aforesaid in and upon a certain cart of the defendant's; yet the defendant neglected his duty in this, to wit, that the cart so used and employed by him in the carriage and conveyance of the goods and chattels was then wholly unsafe and insecure, and in an unfit and improper state and condition for the carriage and conveyance thereof, and the defendant so negligently behaved and conducted himself in the premises, that afterwards, and while the cart was proceeding under the care and management of a certain servant of the defendant's on its way from Carnaby Street aforesaid to New Inn Passage aforesaid with the goods and chattels in and upon the same, by reason and in consequence of the negligence and improper conduct of the defendant, and of the insufficiency of the said cart, and of the same being unsafe and insecure, and in a wholly unfit and improper state and condition for the carriage and conveyance of the said goods and chattels, the said cart broke down, and by means thereof divers of the goods and chattels were broken to pieces, damaged, and spoiled; and also by means thereof the plaintiff, who was then lawfully and rightfully, and by and with the consent of the defendant riding in the cart and accompanying the goods and chattels in their way, to wit, to New Inn Passage aforesaid, was cast and thrown with great force and violence from and out of the said cart, and thereby one of the legs of the plaintiff was broken, and she was otherwise greatly bruised and injured, etc. The defendant denied liability.

E At the trial, before POLLOCK, C.B., at the London Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1853, it appeared that the plaintiff, who was of full age, had engaged the defendant to carry her furniture from her house to New Inn Passage. The defendant sent his servant with a horse and cart to convey the goods, but did not go himself. The plaintiff asked the servant's permission to ride in the cart, to which he assented. On the road the plaintiff expressed her fears that the cart was not safe, but, the defendant's servant, having examined the cart, done some repairs to it, and expressed his opinion that all was right, the plaintiff remained in the cart, and they F proceeded. Shortly afterwards the cart broke down, the goods were thrown out and broken, and the plaintiff was also thrown out and her leg was fractured.

The Lord Chief Baron was of opinion that, although the defendant might be responsible for the loss the plaintiff had sustained for the damage done to her goods, he was not liable for the personal injury she had suffered. The defendant's counsel having admitted that the value of the goods destroyed amounted to £1 15s., the verdict was entered for that sum, with leave to the plaintiff to move for a rule nisi G to increase the amount to £25.

H Hoggins for the plaintiff moved for a rule nisi accordingly.—The question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover for the personal injury she has sustained by reason of the defendant's negligence. [POLLOCK, C.B.—The defendant had contracted to convey the plaintiff's goods only; and it was, therefore, no part of his contract to carry the plaintiff herself; and it did not appear that the defendant gave the plaintiff permission to ride in his cart, or that he had any knowledge of that fact. How can he be liable under such circumstances? Moreover, it is by no means clear that the defendant cannot maintain an action of trespass against the plaintiff for having got into the cart without his authority, and for having assisted in causing the injury to the cart.] The defendant's liability is founded I upon grounds wholly independent of any contract. Lynch v. Nurdin (1) is directly in the plaintiff's favour.

In that case the defendant, having negligently left his horse and cart unattended in the street, the plaintiff, a child seven years old, got upon the cart in play, and another child incautiously led the horse on, and the plaintiff was thereby thrown down and hurt. It was held, that, though the plaintiff was a trespasser, and contributed to the mischief by his own act, the defendant was nevertheless liable for the consequences of that accident. LORD DENMAN, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, says (1 Q.B. at p. 36):

"In the present case an additional fact appears. The plaintiff himself has done wrong: he had no right to enter the cart, and abstaining from doing so would have escaped the mischief. Certainly he was a co-operating cause of his own misfortune by doing an unlawful act; and the question arises, whether that fact alone must deprive the child of his remedy. The legal proposition, that one who has by his own negligence contributed to the injury of which he complains cannot maintain his action against another in respect of it, has received some qualifications."

After citing and commenting upon the several authorities bearing upon this point, the Lord Chief Justice says that the court have come to the conclusion that the fact of such misconduct on the part of the plaintiff is not sufficient to exempt the defendant from the consequences of his own neglect.

Although the defendant was to be paid for the carriage of the plaintiff's goods, and would not receive anything for the carriage of the plaintiff herself, that fact does not exonerate the defendant: Wilson v. Brett (2). [PARKE, B.—A person who undertakes to provide for the conveyance of another, although he does so gratuitously, is bound to exercise due and reasonable care. The decision in Lynch v. Nurdin (1) proceeded wholly upon the ground that the plaintiff had taken as much care as could be expected from a child of tender years—in short, that the plaintiff was blameless, and consequently that the act of the plaintiff did not affect the question; but here the plaintiff's conduct was blameful, as she had no business to get up into the cart without the defendant's permission. ALDERSON, B.—The negligence, in truth, is attributable to the parent who permits the child to be at large. It seems strange that a person who rides in his carriage without a servant, if a child receives an injury by getting up behind for the purpose of having a ride, should be liable for the injury.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all agreed that there ought to be no rule. The case last put raises a doubt as to the authority of Lynch v. Nurdin (1), if it be applicable to the case where a child receives an injury from indulging in what is called "the natural instinct of a child," by getting up behind a gentleman's carriage, there being no servant there. I must admit that if this case were like Lynch v. Nurdin (1) we should not refuse a rule to show cause; but it differs essentially from that case, which was decided upon the ground that the plaintiff, being a child of tender years, could not be considered as causing any part of the injury it had sustained, but that the mischief was occasioned solely by the defendant's default. On the present occasion, the plaintiff brought this accident wholly upon herself. She was of full age, and she got up into the defendant's cart without any right to do so. She ought to have known that she had no authority to do that, and she must, therefore, take all the consequences of her own culpable conduct.

PARKE, B., ALDERSON, B., and MARTIN, B., concurred.

Rule refused.

The defendant lent A. £200 on the security of his bond and an equitable charge on certain property. Subsequently the plaintiff purchased the property, subject to the charges thereon. On an application having been made to A. for the repayment of the £200, he referred to the plaintiff as the purchaser of the property, and the plaintiff paid off the charge. It afterwards turned out that A. had no title to the property in question.

Held: the plaintiff could not recover back the payment of the £200 from the defendant as money had and received for his use.

Rule Nisi obtained by defendant to enter a verdict for him in an action for money had and received.

In 1850 the defendant Short, an attorney at Bristol, lent to one George Carter a sum of £200, and he took as security from George Carter and from two of his brothers, as sureties, a bond in the penal sum of £400. Carter also gave an equitable charge upon some lands in the county of Monmouth. The equitable charge stated: A

"In consideration of Francis Short of the city of Bristol, gentleman, having this day lent and advanced to me the sum of £200 sterling upon the joint and several bond or obligation in writing, of myself and John Carter the younger, and Charles Carter, both of the parish of Clifton in the city and county of Bristol, brewers and maltsters, as my sureties, bearing even date herewith in the penalty of £400 conditioned for the payment of £200, with interest on the same at 5 per cent. per annum, and upon my undertaking to execute to him a valid and effectual legal mortgage of my one undivided eighth part or share of and in the freehold, leasehold, and copyhold estates of Edwin Carter, late of the town of Chepstow in the county of Monmouth, and also of the said parish of Clifton, Esq., deceased, to which I am entitled under and by virtue of his last will and testament in writing, dated the 12th day of January, 1846." B C

Then he bound himself at his own costs and charges, when required, to execute the mortgage.

Short died in the year 1853. Stuckey's Banking Co. (the plaintiff suing as their public officer) had transactions with the Carters. There were six or seven brothers, and there was a firm of John and Charles Carter, who carried on business as brewers in Bristol. That firm, and especially Charles Carter, who was a member of it, became largely indebted to Stuckey's Bank, and George, who had borrowed the £200 of Mr. Short, and given the bond and equitable charge, had accepted some bills in favour of his brothers, in order to secure the bank. After these bills had become due the bankers purchased from him his share and interest in the Monmouthshire estates subject to the charge, among other charges, which he had made to Mr. Short. By a conveyance which was executed on Jan. 25, 1855, George Carter conveyed and assigned and covenanted to surrender the eighth of the freehold, leasehold and copyhold estates which he had under his brother's will. D E

The deed recited, among other things, that F

"by a memorandum by way of equitable charge, bearing date on or about Oct. 19, 1850, the one-eighth part of the said George Carter of and in the hereditaments devised and bequeathed by the said recited will of Edwin Carter deceased, are made liable to the payment of the sum of £200 to Francis Short of the city of Bristol, gentleman, which sum is still due on such security"; G

then there was a recital of the agreement to purchase, which was carried out by a conveyance, and a recital that "the said George Carter has agreed to sell his one undivided eighth part or share, and the said Peter Freeland Aiken and William Gale Coles has agreed to purchase the same, subject to the encumbrances hereinbefore mentioned." H

They, therefore, took the estate and they stood in George Carter's place.

Some time in the year 1855, an application was made to George Carter for the payment of this £200 upon the bond and the equitable charge; and he referred to the bankers at the same time, explaining the transaction. An application was then made to the bankers, who ultimately paid the amount. Subsequently it turned out that the will under which George Carter assumed to take this property, was a will made in January, 1846, that there was a later will executed in the month of April, 1846, and John Carter, one of the brothers, was executor of both wills. He had proved the former will. Thereupon the title, of course, which George assumed to have under the former will was gone, because it appeared that under the second will he only took an annuity which ceased upon his making any assignment. The bankers thereupon contended that they are entitled to recover this money back, and accordingly brought this action for money had and received for their use. I

A The action was tried before PLATT, B., at the sittings after Hilary Term, when a verdict was returned for the plaintiff, with leave for the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him. The defendant obtained a rule accordingly.

Knowles, Q.C. (Field with him), showed cause against the rule.

M. Smith, Q.C. (Gray with him), supported the rule.

B POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the rule must be absolute. The case, when examined, is quite clear, and the facts lie in a narrow compass. The defendant's testator, Short, had a claim on Carter—a bond and a security on property which Carter afterwards mortgaged to the bank. The defendant, who was the executrix of Short, applied to Carter for payment. He referred her to the bank, who, conceiving that the defendant had a good equitable charge, paid the debt, as they reasonably might do, to get rid of the charge affecting their interest. C In consequence of the discovery of a later will of Edwin Carter, it turned out that the defendant had no title. The bank had paid the money in one sense without any consideration, but the defendant had a perfect right to receive the money from Carter, and the bankers paid for him. They should have taken care not to have paid over the money to get a valueless security, but the defendant has nothing to do with their mistake. D Suppose it was announced that there was to be a dividend on the estate of a trader, and persons to whom he was indebted went to an office and received instalments of the debts due to them, could the party paying recover back the money if it turned out that he was wrong in supposing that he had funds in hand? The money was, in fact, paid by the bank, as the agents of Carter.

E PLATT, B.—I am of the same opinion. The action for money had and received lies only for money which the defendant ought to refund ex æquo et bono. Was there any obligation here to refund? There was a debt due to Short, secured by a bond and a supposed equitable charge by way of collateral security. The property on which Short had the charge was conveyed by Carter to the bank. Short having died, the defendant, his executrix, applied to George Carter for payment of the debt due to her husband, the testator. Carter referred her to the bank, who paid the debt, and the bond was satisfied. F The money which the defendant got from her debtor was actually due to her, and there can be no obligation to refund it.

BRAMWELL, B.—My brother Martin, before he left the court, desired me to say that he was of the same opinion, and so am I.

G In order to entitle a person to recover back money paid under a mistake of fact, the mistake must be as to a fact which, if true, would make the person paying liable to pay the money; not where, if true, it would merely make it desirable that he should pay the money. Here, if the fact was true, the bankers were at liberty to pay or not, as they pleased. But relying on the belief that the defendant had a valid security, they, having a subsequent legal mortgage, chose to pay off the defendant's charge. It is impossible to say that this case falls within the rule. H The mistake of fact was, that the bank thought that they could sell the estate for a better price. It is true that if the plaintiff could recover back this money from the defendant, there would be no difficulty in the way of the defendant suing Carter.

I In Pritchard v. Hitchcock (1) a creditor was held to be at liberty to sue upon a guarantee of bills, though the bills had been in fact paid, but the money afterwards recovered back by the assignees of the acceptor, as having been paid by way of fraudulent preference. But that does not show that the plaintiffs can maintain this action, and I am of opinion they cannot, having voluntarily parted with their money to purchase that which the defendant had to sell, though no doubt it turned out to be different to, and of less value than, what they expected.

Rule absolute.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to enter a nonsuit in an action of assumpsit for money paid to the defendant's use. Plea, non assumpsit.

At the trial, before PARKE, B., it appeared that the action was brought to recover the sum of £25 paid by the plaintiff under the following circumstances. The plaintiff drew and endorsed a bill of exchange for £100 for the defendant's accommodation. It was delivered to the defendant, who accepted it and negotiated it. When due it was not paid by the defendant, but, without being requested to do so by the defendant, the plaintiff paid £25 to the holder, and that sum he sought to recover from the defendant. The bill, not being taken up, remained in the hands of the holder in order that he might recover the balance from the defendant and other parties, and there was no proof of due presentment to the defendant, nor of notice of dishonour. The learned judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, reserving leave for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit. The defendant obtained a rule accordingly.

Martin and Bernard showed cause against the rule.

Crowder supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 4, 1850. PARKE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—The question in this case is whether the plaintiff can recover, in an action for money

- A paid to the defendant's use, the sum of £25, which he paid under these circumstances. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts as above set forth.] It must be taken, therefore, for the purposes of this suit, that the plaintiff has paid the money without being compellable at law to do so. To make a person liable in this form of action for money paid to the defendant's use, the plaintiff must not merely show that the money paid pro tanto discharges the liability of the defendant to the holder of the bill, but also that it was paid at the request, express or implied, of the defendant. Here the money paid clearly discharges pro tanto the liability of the defendant, as acceptor, to the holder; and it is also clear that there was no express request from the defendant to the plaintiff to pay the money. It remains, therefore, to be seen whether there was, from the circumstances, an implied request for him to do so.
- C There is no doubt, that, if a person lends his name to another for his accommodation, the party accommodated undertakes to pay the bill at maturity, and further, to indemnify the person accommodating him, in case that person is compelled to pay the bill for him: BYLES ON BILLS OF EXCHANGE (5th Edn.), p. 94; and this, no doubt, is an implied authority to such person to pay it, if he be in that situation that he may be compelled by law to pay the bill, though the holder do not actually compel him to do so; and after payment he may sue the party accommodated for money paid on his account; for such payment is, in truth, under the implied authority given by the contract of accommodation between the parties; and whether this be a payment of the whole bill, or of only a part of it, makes no difference. But the defendant, as the person accommodated, has not, we think, undertaken to indemnify the plaintiff against the consequences of any payment which the plaintiff may voluntarily make with knowledge of the circumstances.

- Whether it is so in cases in which the legal obligation has been discharged by circumstances unknown to him, as for instance, by the creditor having given time to the principal debtor without his knowledge, it is unnecessary to determine; but where a payment is made, as in this case, with the knowledge on the part of the plaintiff that he was not bound to pay, for the want of a notice of dishonour, to which he was unquestionably entitled, we think the payment is not made with the implied authority of the defendant. It is very true, that, if the plaintiff here had voluntarily paid the whole bill, he might have sued the defendant; but this is on another principle, viz., that the plaintiff becomes the holder of the bill after it is paid by him; and a holder so situated may, according to the law-merchant, sue the acceptor upon the bill itself; for the holder may always waive the want of due presentment and notice, and sue the acceptor, who is not discharged by the want of it, but not a collateral party, who is discharged by the same laches. But the holder in such case does not sue him as for the money paid to his use, nor is a request, express or implied, in such a case at all material to his recovering the amount. But here the plaintiff cannot sue on the bill; for, not having paid it, he is not the holder; and he has on these facts only paid money to the holder voluntarily, and without request, express or implied, from the defendant. We are, therefore, of opinion that the defendant is entitled to our judgment and the rule will be absolute to enter a nonsuit.
- H

Rule absolute.

Demurrer in an action for libel.

The declaration contained a count for libel, and two counts for slander, each imputing to the plaintiff company insolvency, mismanagement, and an improper and dishonest carrying on of its affairs; concluding with a breach, that by means of committing of those several grievances by the defendant the company were greatly damaged, injured, and brought into public disgrace and contempt, and the value of the property of the company, and of the shares therein, was much depreciated, and the company were otherwise greatly damnified, to the damage, etc. The defendant pleaded to the first count, that before and at the time of the committing of the grievances in that count he was a shareholder in the company, to wit, to the amount of 150 shares, and that he had ever since continued to be, and was at the commencement of the suit, a shareholder in the company. To this plea the plaintiffs demurred.

Edwardes for the plaintiffs.

Stammers for the defendant.

A POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the plea cannot be sustained. That a corporation at common law can sue in respect of a libel there is no doubt. It would be monstrous if a corporation could maintain no action for slander of title through which they lost a great deal of money. It could not sue in respect of an imputation of murder, or incest, or adultery, because it could not commit those crimes. Nor could it sue in respect of a charge of corruption, for a corporation cannot be guilty of corruption, although the individuals composing it may. But it would be very odd if a corporation had no means of protecting itself against wrong; and if its property is injured by slander it has no means of redress except by action. Therefore, it appears to me clear that a corporation at common law may maintain an action for a libel by which its property is injured.

C Then, has a corporation created under the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856, the same power? Though that Act makes the partnership a corporation, counsel for the defendant says that this is merely for the purpose of carrying on the business mentioned in it, and that it can only sue in respect of matters necessarily incident to that purpose. But in order to carry on business it is necessary that the reputation of such a corporation should be protected, and, therefore, in the case of libel or slander it must have a remedy by action. With respect to the question of partnership, that raises a different consideration. An action cannot be brought by several partners against one of them, for a party cannot be both plaintiff and defendant.

E Then, can a quasi corporation, which as a body may sue other people, maintain an action for libel against one of its own members? There is no doubt that a corporation at common law can sue one of its members for a penalty incurred by breach of a byelaw; and why should not a quasi corporation possess similar powers? Such a corporation may recover a debt from one of its own members—indeed that is a very common form of action, and the money when recovered belongs to the whole body of which the defendant is a member. Then, if a quasi corporation may sue for the recovery of money, surely it must also have the power to protect itself against injury by an action for libel? Upon these grounds I think that the action is maintainable.

G MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. This is an action for libel, in which a joint stock company is plaintiff; and it is argued that such an action cannot be maintained. No doubt, in looking into the old books, nothing on the subject will be found; but in modern times there has sprung up a class of corporations which are trading bodies, such as dock and canal companies, and it is nowhere laid down that such corporations are deprived of the protection of the law in case they are libelled. If so, the Hull Dock Co. might be libelled with impunity by one of its members asserting that a dock was in such a state that no vessel could come into it; but there is no pretence for saying that in such case the company could not sue in respect of the injury done to its trade by the libel. As my Lord said, there may be particular kinds of libel which cannot affect a corporation, but in respect of such libels as are injurious to it an action may be maintained.

I Then is it any answer that the libeller is a member of the corporate body? By the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856, s. 4, the company became in effect "a body corporate," that is, it has an existence separate and distinct from that of its members; and there is nothing to make an action by the body corporate an action by the individual members. If the defendant had been run over by an omnibus of the company, according to the argument of counsel for the defendant, he could have maintained no action for the injury done to him. But if a member of the corporation may maintain an action against it for injury to him, the corporation may maintain an action against him for injury to it. I said, in the course of the argument, that I did not see why, in the case of an ordinary partnership, the other members might not maintain an action against one partner who libelled it; and Longman v. Pole (1) supports that view.

That was an action by five members of a partnership firm, charging the defendant with colluding with the other partner to injure them. It was objected that the plaintiffs could not maintain the action in their joint names, they having no joint capacity independent of the other partner, and no joint partnership fund of their own distinct from him, at the time of the tort charged, and, therefore, it could not be to their joint damage. But LORD TENTERDEN said (Mood. & M. at p. 225):

"I think in point of law this action is maintainable; if a person colludes with one partner in a firm to enable him to injure the other partners, I think they can maintain a joint action against the person so colluding."

Here the defendant is a distinct person from the corporation who sues.

WATSON, B.—I am also of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. It is said that no action for libel will lie by a quasi corporation, because it is created for certain purposes only, and does not differ from an ordinary partnership. But it is clear that an ordinary partnership would have a right to maintain an action against one of its members for injury to their real or personal property, and for all wrongs done to them. Then suppose the firm becomes incorporated, but not for all purposes, is the law to afford no protection to them? One of the safeguards to individuals against libel is the remedy by action; and I cannot conceive a proposition more dangerous than this, that because a company is incorporated they have no appeal to a court of justice if they are libelled. During the argument I referred to the case in the Common Pleas of Williams v. Beaumont (2), where a joint stock company were empowered to sue in the name of their chairman, and it was held that they might sue in his name for a libel on the company.

As to the plea of the defendant, it is difficult to deal with it. He says, in effect: "I am a member of the corporation, and, therefore, I have a right to libel it." That is a startling proposition. If it were true, a person might buy a single share in a banking company and libel it with impunity. Such a state of the law would utterly destroy the business of these companies. In this respect I cannot distinguish between corporations created for certain purposes and corporations at common law; they all have a perpetual succession and a common seal. Why are we to make a distinction when the legislature says that these joint stock companies shall be corporations? It is one of the incidents of a corporation that it may sue and be sued in the corporate name, and for the purposes of the suit a member of the corporation is a mere stranger. It would make strange work in the law if we were to hold that the ordinary incidents of a corporation did not attach to companies incorporated by Act of Parliament.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

KEATES v. EARL CADOGAN

*Landlord and Tenant—Liability of landlord—House let in dangerous condition—
No notice by landlord to tenant—No misrepresentation by landlord.*

The tenant of premises alleged that at the time of the agreement for letting the premises were dangerous, that this fact was known to the landlord but not to the tenant, and that the landlord failed to give notice to the tenant that the premises were in a dangerous state.

Held: there being no allegation that the landlord made any misrepresentation, or that he knew that the tenant was acting under an improper belief as to the state of the premises, or that he did not believe that the tenant would make an investigation and satisfy himself as to the state of the premises, there was no obligation on him (the landlord) to give the tenant notice of the state of the premises.

Demurrer by the plaintiff in an action on the case, in which the plaintiff, a tenant, claimed against his landlord for the failure of the landlord to disclose at the time of the letting that the premises were dangerous; the landlord pleaded he was under no duty to disclose the same, and the plaintiff demurred to this plea.

The first count of the declaration stated that the defendant was possessed of a dwelling-house which, at the time of the agreement thereafter mentioned, and thence until the plaintiff entered into, and occupied, and dwelt therein, was in such a ruinous and dangerous state and condition as to be dangerous to enter, occupy, or dwell in, and was likely wholly or in part to fall down, and thereby do damage and injury to the persons and property therein, and which the defendant then well knew; and that the plaintiff without any knowledge or notice that the house was in that state and condition, to wit, on Nov. 20, 1848, proposed to the defendant that the defendant should demise to him, and that the plaintiff should take of him as his tenant for the purpose of the plaintiff's immediately occupying and dwelling in the same, the house, and for the term of three years, at a certain rent and upon certain terms to be agreed upon. Thereupon the defendant, well knowing the premises, by an agreement in writing between the defendant, by P., his agent of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part, the defendant did demise to the plaintiff the dwelling-house for the term of three years at a yearly rent; and the plaintiff thereby also agreed with the defendant to take, and did thereby take the dwelling-house for the agreed term. And the plaintiff thereupon then entered into and upon the dwelling-house, and commenced occupying and dwelling therein. The plaintiff further says, that he did not have any knowledge or notice that the house was in the said state and condition, so as to be dangerous to enter, occupy or dwell in, or that it was likely wholly or in part to fall down; and the defendant, during all the time aforesaid, well knew that the plaintiff had not any such knowledge or notice; and, although the defendant might and ought to, before the plaintiff entered upon and commenced occupying or dwelling in the house, have given to the plaintiff notice that the house was in such state and condition, and likely, wholly or in part, to fall down; yet the defendant, not regarding his duty, did not give notice to the plaintiff that the house was in the said state and condition, by means of which premises, while the plaintiff and his family were occupying the house, a great part of the said house, by reason of its being in such a ruinous and dangerous state and condition, fell down, and was no longer habitable, and thereby the lives of the plaintiff and his family were greatly endangered. This count concluded with an allegation of special damage; of the illness of plaintiff's wife, caused by the premises; of injury to the plaintiff's goods and chattels, and to his trade of a tobacconist.

To the first count the defendant pleaded that it was not his duty to have given to the plaintiff such notice as in the first count mentioned. Special demurrer to this plea.

Cleasby for the plaintiff.

Needham for the defendant.

JERVIS, C.J.—I have felt some difficulty in consequence of Hill v. Gray (1), which has been cited as if it had decided without more that the mere allowing a party to act upon a delusion was sufficient to set aside a contract of sale. But in Hill v. Gray (1) there was what may be termed a positive aggressive deceit, as appears from the judgment of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, who says (1 Stark. at p. 435):

"He [the plaintiff's agent] saw that the defendant had fallen into a delusion in supposing the picture to be Sir Felix Agar's, and yet he did not remove it."

That difficulty being removed, I think that this declaration does not disclose a sufficient cause of action. It is not contended that there is any implied warranty on the part of the defendant that the house should be fit for immediate occupation, but it is said that because the defendant knew it was in a ruinous state, and did not give notice to the plaintiff of it, he is liable. The plaintiff has not been guilty of any active deceit. It is consistent with the declaration that the defendant knew that the house was in want of repairs, and that the plaintiff might have gone to the defendant and said, "I wish to take that house; will you lease it to me?" and that the defendant said, "Yes, I will." It is not alleged that the defendant made any misrepresentation, or that he knew that the plaintiff was acting under an improper belief as to the state of the house, or that he did not believe that the plaintiff would

A make an investigation and satisfy himself as to the state of the house. This is an ordinary case of letting, and there was no obligation on the party to make a communication as to the state of the house, and there is nothing amounting to deceit on the part of the defendant.

MAULE, CRESSWELL and WILLIAMS, JJ., concurred.

C ROYAL BRITISH BANK v. TURQUAND

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER (Jervis, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Alderson, B., Cresswell and Crowder, JJ., and Bramwell, B.), May 1, 1856]

D [Reported 6 E. & B. 327; 25 L.J.Q.B. 317; 2 Jur.N.S. 663; 119 E.R. 886]

Company—Borrowing—Authority—Directors given power to borrow subject to resolution of company—Right of lender to assume resolution passed.

E The deed of settlement of a company registered under the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1844, allowed the directors to borrow on bond such sum or sums of money as might from time to time, by a resolution passed at a general meeting of the company, be authorised to be borrowed. By a bond under the seal of the company and signed by two directors, the company acknowledged themselves to be bound to the plaintiffs for £2,000. In an action on the bond, the company pleaded that there had been no resolution authorising the making of the bond.

F Held: persons dealing with the company were bound to make themselves acquainted with the statute and the deed of settlement of the company, but they were not bound to do more; a person, on reading the deed of settlement, would find, not a prohibition against borrowing, but a permission to borrow on certain conditions, and, learning that the authority might be made complete by a resolution, he would have a right to infer the fact of a resolution authorising that which on the face of the document appeared to be legitimately done; and, therefore, the company was liable whether or not a resolution had been passed.

G Notes. Under the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict., c. 110), s. 25 (repealed) upon the complete registration of any company being certified by the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, such company was empowered (inter alia),
H "to borrow or raise money within the limitations prescribed by any special authority."

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench (LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., COLERIDGE and ERLE, JJ.), reported 5 E. & B. 248, on demurrer, in an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant, as official manager of Cameron's Coalbrook Steam, Coal, and Swansea and London Rail. Co., according to the Joint Stock Companies Winding-Up Acts (the company being completely registered under the statute 7 & 8 Vict., c. 110) for the non-payment of the sum of £2,000 for which they alleged the company, before the defendant became official manager, to wit on Mar. 6, 1850, by their writing obligatory, sealed with their common seal, acknowledged themselves to be held and firmly bound to the plaintiffs, to be paid to the plaintiffs on request; for which payment the company did bind themselves and their successors.

A The first plea set out the condition, which appeared to be for securing to the plaintiffs, who were bankers, such sum as the company should, to the amount of £1,000, owe to plaintiffs on the balance of the account current, from time to time, and for indemnifying plaintiffs to that amount from losses incurred by reason of the account between plaintiffs and the company. The plea further set out clauses of the registered deed of settlement of the company, by which it appeared that the directors were authorised, under certain circumstances, to give bills, notes, bonds or mortgages: and one clause provided that the directors might borrow on bond such sums as should, from time to time, by a general resolution of the company, be authorised to be borrowed. The plea averred that there had been no such resolution authorising the making of the bond, and that the same was given and made without the authority or consent of the shareholders of the company.

C The replication set out the deed of settlement further, by which it appeared that the company was formed for the purpose of carrying on mining operations and forming a railway. It then alleged that, at a general meeting of the company, it was resolved

D "that the directors of the said company should be, and they were thereby, authorised to borrow on mortgage, bond or otherwise, such sums for such periods and at such rates of interest as they might deem expedient, in accordance with the provisions of the deed of settlement and Act of Parliament. And the said resolution and determination has thence hitherto remained unrescinded."

E The replication then alleged that afterwards, in accordance with the authority granted by the general meeting, the directors agreed to enter into the bond, and appointed two directors to affix their seal, and the secretary to sign the bond, which bond, so sealed and signed, plaintiffs took

"in full faith and belief of the validity of the said resolutions, and that the said bond was authorised by, and would be a valid and binding security upon, the said company."

F The plaintiffs also demurred to the plea. The defendant joined in demurrer, and also demurred to the replication. Joinder. The Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant appealed.

Phipson for the defendant.
Bovill for the plaintiffs.

G JERVIS, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench ought to be affirmed. I incline to think that the question which has been principally argued both here and in that court does not necessarily arise, and need not be determined. My impression is (though I will not state it as a fixed opinion) that the resolution set forth in the replication goes far enough to satisfy the requisites of the deed of settlement. The deed allows the directors to borrow on bond such sum or sums of money as shall from time to time, by a resolution passed at a general meeting of the company, be authorised to be borrowed: and the replication shows a resolution, passed at a general meeting, authorising the directors to borrow on bond such sums for such periods and at such rates of interest as they might deem expedient, in accordance with the deed of settlement and the Act of Parliament; but the resolution does not otherwise define the amount to be borrowed.

I That seems to me enough. If that be so, the other question does not arise. But whether it be so or not we need not decide; for it seems to us that the plea, whether we consider it as a confession and avoidance or a special non est factum, does not raise any objection to this advance as against the company. We may now take for granted that the dealings with these companies are not like dealings with other partnerships, and that the parties dealing with them are bound to read the statute and the deed of settlement. But they are not bound to do more. The party here, on reading the deed of settlement, would find, not a prohibition from borrowing, but a permission to do so on certain conditions. Finding that the authority might be made complete by a resolution, he would have a right to infer the fact of a resolution authorising that which on the face of the document appeared to be legitimately done. A Trustee—Removal—Bankruptcy—Discretion of court.

The powers of removing bankrupt trustees are not imperative, but discretionary. Bankruptcy of a trustee is good ground for his removal if the bankruptcy in the smallest degree endangers the trust property in his hands, but the mere fact of a trustee having, at some time or other during his trusteeship, been a bankrupt, is not, in itself, a ground for his removal. E

Notes. The Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849, s. 130, has been repealed: under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38 (2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 373) the property of the bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise property held by the bankrupt on trust for any other person. The Trustee Act, 1850, s. 32, has been repealed and replaced by the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 41. F

Petition presented under the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849, praying the removal of a Mr. Bridgman from the trusteeship of settlement funds, and the appointment of a new trustee in his place.

The petitioners were some of Mr. Bridgman's cestuis que trust, and the grounds on which it was sought to remove Mr. Bridgman and to appoint a new trustee were that Mr. Bridgman had some time since been a bankrupt, although it was admitted that he was now perfectly solvent, and that he had been guilty of vexatious conduct in the management of the trust. The bankruptcy occurred in 1855. In 1856, Mr.

A Bridgman had obtained a first class certificate in bankruptcy. There was no suggestion that his continuing as a trustee would endanger the trust property. But for the expense of realising his estate, his creditors would have been paid in full; and since his bankruptcy he had been appointed to an official situation of some importance.

B By the statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 79, it was enacted, and by the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, s. 130, it is re-enacted,

C "that if any bankrupt shall as trustee be seised, possessed of, or entitled to, either alone or jointly, any real or personal estate, or any interest secured upon or arising out of the same, or shall have standing in his name as trustee, either alone or jointly, any government stocks, funds or annuities, or any of the stock of any public company either in England, Scotland or Ireland, it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor, on the petition of the person entitled in possession to the receipt of the rents, issues and profits, dividends, interest, or produce thereof, on due notice given to all other persons (if any) interested therein, to order the assignees and all persons whose act or consent thereto is necessary, to convey, assign, or transfer the said estates, interest, stock, funds, or annuities to such person as the Lord Chancellor shall think fit, upon the same trusts as the said estates, interests, stocks, funds, or annuities, were subject to before the bankruptcy, or such of them as shall be then subsisting and capable of taking effect, and also to receive and pay over the rents, issues and profits, dividends, interest, or produce thereof as the Lord Chancellor shall direct."

E By the Trustee Act, 1850, s. 32, it was enacted,

"that whenever it shall be expedient to appoint a new trustee or new trustees, and it shall be found inexpedient, difficult, or impracticable so to do without the assistance of the Court of Chancery, it shall be lawful for the said Court of Chancery to make an order appointing a new trustee, or new trustees, either in substitution for, or in addition to any existing trustee or trustees."

F Glasse, Q.C. (Baggallay with him), supported the prayer of the petition. Karslake for Mr. Bridgman. Shapter, Q.C., for other parties.

G KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—I must say, under all the circumstances of this case, I very much regret that this petition should ever have been presented; the more so as it appears to me to contain charges which are wholly irrelevant to its real object. The intention of the legislature, when it enacted the statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, was to protect property of cestuis que trust in the hands of their trustees, and if the trustees became bankrupt, to secure it to the cestuis que trust in the same state as it was before the trustee's bankruptcy. No doubt that was the intention of the legislature. The language of that Act was adopted, and is the same as that used in the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849. [His Honour read the two sections as above stated.] Those Acts give this court a power—irrespective of the question whether the power so given is imperative or discretionary—but they give this court a power to remove a bankrupt trustee—a trustee who has been a bankrupt—and to appoint a new one in his place. Long before these Acts, it was settled law that property in the hands of a trustee, merely as such, did not vest in his assignees on the bankruptcy. But then there arose a doubt whether the assignees were necessary parties to a conveyance of the trust property; and upon that Ex parte Gennys (1) was decided. There was also another doubt, which was, whether this court—that is, whether a vice-chancellor—could exercise any jurisdiction in the bankruptcy, independent of the Lord Chancellor's jurisdiction in such cases. That doubt was resolved in the affirmative.

This court, then, having jurisdiction, both by these statutes and upon the authorities, to deal with the matter, is it the law of the land that if application is made to this court for the removal of a trustee who has some time or other during his trusteeship been a bankrupt—is it, I repeat, the law of the land that this court must remove him from the trust? Do the words of the bankruptcy statutes impose any such imperative obligation on this court? I am clearly of opinion that they impose no such imperative duty. When these Acts say that “it shall be lawful” for this court to do or abstain from doing a particular thing, they clearly give the court a discretionary power, and the mere fact of the bankruptcy of a trustee does not enable this court to remove him from the trust, while he is performing his duty in it. Just look at what the consequences might be if it were so: a quarrel might arise between the parties, any one of them might come to this court, and might get a compulsory order, on an ex parte case, for the removal of the trustee. I am quite of opinion that in all such cases as these, the powers given to this court by the Bankruptcy Acts are discretionary, and not imperative. A

Now we come to the other part of this case, the conduct of Mr. Bridgman in this trust. In the month of November, 1856, Mr. Bridgman obtained a first-class certificate in bankruptcy. At that time his assets consisted of a sum of £10,000 or £12,000, which was due to him in this very trust, he having advanced that sum for the benefit of the petitioners, who now seek to have him removed from the trust. I believe he claimed some other small sums, but his assets may be stated to have then been about £10,000 or £12,000. Evidence has been adduced to show that, but for the expense of realising his estate, it would have paid all his creditors in full. A circumstance which, I think, proves that the bankruptcy alone did not render him an unfit person to be a trustee. Since the bankruptcy he has been appointed to some official situation, which he still holds, a situation I believe of considerable importance. There is no sort of suggestion that the continuing him in the trust will endanger the trust property, and I assume that there is no ground for anything of the sort; for most assuredly I think, if such a suggestion could have been, it would have been made in this case. What was said, however, is this, that since the bankruptcy Mr. Bridgman has been guilty of vexatious conduct, and that that conduct related to certain sales of part of the trust property. B C D E

[His Honour then considered the allegation that Mr. Bridgman had been vexatious in improperly impeding the sale of part of the trust property, and continued:] F No real case of vexatious conduct has been established against him. And even if it had been, inasmuch as this petition is presented under the bankruptcy statute, the question of vexatious conduct is altogether irrelevant. To say that he has been guilty of vexatious conduct as trustee, is in no sort of way connected with the objection that is based on the fact of his having been a bankrupt. If any charge of vexatious conduct is made against a trustee, it must be by bill, and not by petition G under the Bankruptcy Act. Bankruptcy is a good ground for the removal of a trustee when it, in the smallest degree, endangers the property in his hands. But there is, as I have already said, no suggestion in this case of anything of the sort, and I may observe also, there is no suggestion that Mr. Bridgman had any difficulty in obtaining his first-class certificate. Moreover, after he has obtained it, in 1856—up to the presentation of this petition—all parties deal with him as trustee, and never, until they actually present this petition, dream of suggesting the bankruptcy as a ground for his removal. Now they only allege it as an additional ground. It appears to me, upon the whole of this case, that even if vexatious conduct be in itself a ground for the removal of a trustee, no such conduct has been established here; that the Bankruptcy Act does not render it imperative upon this court to remove a bankrupt trustee, merely on that ground; that the circumstances in this case do not call for the exercise of the discretionary power of this court for Mr. Bridgman's removal from this trust; and that all I can, therefore, do, is to dismiss this petition with costs. HOPE v. HOPE

[COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY (Lord Cranworth, L.C.), May 27, June 3, 5, 7, August 5, 1854]

Infant—Custody—Jurisdiction of court—Children of English father born and resident abroad.

C

The husband, an English subject, and the wife, a French subject, were married in 1836; both were resident in France and all the children were born in France. In February, 1853, the parties separated, and the husband came to reside in England. The wife continued to reside in France and retained two of the children under interim orders for their custody obtained in the French courts, the remainder of the children being resident in England. In August, 1853, the wife commenced proceedings for divorce in England. The husband having settled a sum on trust for the children, on Nov. 14, 1853, a petition was filed in the name of the infant children against both the husband and the wife to make the children wards of court. The wife was served with an order directing her to concur with her husband in taking such steps as should be necessary according to the laws of France to authorise the delivery up of the two children to the husband. The wife opposed the husband's application in the French courts for such delivery up, and she obtained a further interim order for their custody. The husband now applied for a further order to be made on the wife that within one week she deliver up the two children to him or otherwise concur with the husband in taking such steps, etc. The wife opposed this application on the point of jurisdiction.

Held: the Court of Chancery had jurisdiction over the custody of infants born of an English subject although such children were born and resident abroad.

F

Notes. The wardship of infants is assigned to the Chancery Division by s. 56 (1) (b) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (18 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 490). An order of court is required to make an infant a ward of court by s. 9 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949 (28 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 777).

H

Motion by the husband that his wife within one week after service of the order be ordered to deliver up to the husband the two sons of the marriage which were residing with the wife in France and that the wife be ordered to concur with the husband in taking all such steps as might be necessary and proper according to the laws of France for causing the children to be so delivered up to the husband, their father.

I

This motion originally came before LORD ROMILLY, M.R., on May 9, 1854, when His Lordship expressed a strong view that he had jurisdiction to make such an order. Both parties being unwilling to go into the merits, it was arranged, by leave of the court, that the motion should be heard by LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., as an original motion on the point as to jurisdiction.

The husband, a British subject, and the wife, a French subject, were married in July, 1836. Both resided in France and there were five children of the marriage, all born in France. Differences arose between the parties and in February, 1853, the husband brought the five children to England and placed them in the care of relatives. Shortly afterwards the husband permitted his two sons to reside with his wife in France on her written undertaking to return them to her husband at the end of three months. On June 29, 1853, the French Appeal Court confirmed previous interim orders for the two sons to remain with the wife but decreed that they should be delivered to the husband on Sept. 15, 1853 "if it had not been otherwise ordered on this head by the English tribunals." In August, 1853, the wife commenced proceedings in England for divorce and these proceedings were still pending. On Oct. 5, 1853, on the wife's application, the French court decreed that the two sons should remain in her custody for four months. The husband having settled a sum in trust for the children, on Nov. 14, 1853, a petition was filed on behalf of the children against both husband and wife to make the infant children wards of court. On Nov. 22, 1853, an order was obtained for substituted service on the wife and an order was made prefaced by a declaration that by the law of England the custody of the children belonged to the husband and directing the wife to concur with her husband in taking all such steps as might be proper and necessary according to the laws of France to cause the delivery up of the children to the husband. This order was served on the wife in France. The husband applied to the French court for delivery up of the children, and the application was opposed by the wife and by a representation that she had appealed against the order to the House of Lords and that pending such an appeal the order was in abeyance. The French court thereupon declined to interfere with a further interim order made as to the children remaining with the wife. The husband now applied that notwithstanding the previous order served on the wife, a further order, in similar terms, for delivery up of the children within one week, be made against the wife. This application was opposed by the wife on the point of jurisdiction.

Roundel Palmer and Amphlett for the children.

Sir Richard Bethell, and Terrel and Wise, for the wife.

J. W. Stephen for the husband.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—I do not think this case admits of any doubt. In my former order I declared that by the law of England the custody of the children belonged to the husband; and in order that nothing in that former order might, by any possibility, lead the parties into conflict with the laws of France, the order, was upon deliberation, cautiously worded, directing the wife to concur with the husband in taking all such steps as might be necessary, according to the laws of France, to cause the delivery up of the children to their father. What has been done is this. In the first instance the father made an application to the French tribunal to obtain the delivery up of the children; and as this question was there treated not altogether as a private one, but one in which the state had an interest in the protection of the children, an interim order had been made for their remaining with their mother. Then came the application of the husband to this court, when an order was made of such a nature as could not lead this court into any conflict with the French courts. The course which the wife ought to have taken was to have instructed counsel, if necessary, to consent on her part to the delivery up of the children. If then she had so acted, and then the French courts had said, "For certain reasons, that cannot be acceded to," I should have been the last individual to have pretended to exercise any jurisdiction over what was done by the French tribunals, for whose decisions I have the most profound respect.

The wife, however, has not thought fit to adopt that course, and an argument has been raised by her against the application made by her husband. She does what my former order in substance forbids her to do—she appears upon the application of her husband and opposes it. The question is, what course am I now to adopt? If the parties were within this court's jurisdiction, I should make a short order upon the wife to do what she was ordered to do by my former order within a few days, or to stand committed. The course which I shall take as dictated by the peculiar circumstances of the case is this. I shall preface my order by declaring that, according to the laws of this country, an appeal to the House of Lords does not suspend the execution of an order of the Lord Chancellor, unless, under special

- A circumstances, a special order had been previously obtained to suspend it. No application for such an order has been made, nor do I think that I should have acceded to it if it had been. I shall then go on to order that the wife do, within a week from the service of this order, deliver up the children to the husband, or otherwise concur with him in taking such steps as may be necessary according to the laws of France to authorise her to deliver up the children to him. I have no
- B doubt that the effect of this declaration, when the case comes again before the French courts, will be that they will give me credit for having correctly enunciated the law of this country, as I undoubtedly give them credit of correctly stating the French law. To so much of the notice of motion as asks that the wife may be restrained from making any application to the French courts, I shall not accede, inasmuch as such an order may be misunderstood in those courts.

Order accordingly.

Insurance—Life assurance—Proposal—Non-disclosure by assured of material facts—Facts not believed by assured to be material—Illness of which assured knew, without being aware it tended to shorten life—Limitation by underwriter of right to be informed.

F

In the personal declaration made and signed by the assured, which was to form the basis of a contract of life assurance, he stated that he was not aware of any circumstance, or that he had any disorder, tending to shorten his life, or to make an assurance on his life more than ordinarily hazardous. The question arose whether the policy could be avoided if the assured had to his knowledge had attacks of ill-health without being aware that their effect was to tend to shorten his life or to render an assurance on his life more than usually hazardous.

G

Held: the underwriters had so limited their rights that the declaration would only be untrue if the assured not only was aware of some circumstance or disorder, but also was aware that its effect was to tend to shorten life or to render an assurance on his life more than usually hazardous, and, those not being the facts, an action on the policy by the personal representative of the deceased assured succeeded.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 4, 1857. WILLIAMS, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.— D
This was an action brought by the plaintiff as administrator of John Powell Jones, deceased, against the Provincial Insurance Co. upon a policy of insurance for £1,000, effected by the intestate upon his own life in the office of the defendants on Feb. 28, 1855. The policy stated that the intestate had delivered into the office of the defendants a declaration in writing, signed by him and being of the same date as the policy, and which it was agreed should be the basis of the contract of E assurance. By this declaration, actually signed, it was declared that the age of the assured did not exceed twenty-nine years; that he had had the smallpox or cowpox; that he had not certain specified diseases; that no proposal to insure his life had been declined at any office; that he was then in good health, and did ordinarily enjoy good health, and that he was not aware of any circumstance or disorder tending to shorten his life or to render an assurance on his life more than ordinarily F hazardous, unless anything stated in answer to certain questions which preceded the declaration might be so considered. The assured also thereby declared that the medical and private referees named by him in answer to two of those questions were competent to give information as to his past and present state of health and habits of life. The declaration so made was, in some respects, erroneously recited in the policy, particularly in adding to the statement that the assured had never been G afflicted with the specified diseases, the words "or any other disease, ailment, or infirmity tending to the shortening of life." It, however, also contained the statement that the intestate

"was not aware of any circumstance, or that he had any disorder tending to shorten his life or to make an assurance on his life more than usually hazardous." H

The declaration in the cause is in the usual form, stating the policy, the payment of the premiums, the death of the assured, and the performance of conditions precedent. The important pleas were the second, fourth and fifth. The second plea stated, that the declaration in the policy mentioned was untrue in this, that at the time of making it the assured had been and was afflicted with a disease, ailment or infirmity tending to the shortening of life. The fourth plea was, that the declaration I was untrue in this, that at the time of making it the assured was aware of circumstances which rendered an assurance on his life more than usually hazardous. The fifth plea was, that the declaration was untrue in this, that at the time of making it the assured was aware that he had a disorder tending to shorten his life, or to render an assurance on it more than commonly hazardous. Issues in fact were joined upon these pleas.

At the trial before MARTIN, B., it appeared that the assured had had a bilious attack, not being one of the specified illnesses, in November, 1853, and another in

A May and June, 1854. The evidence as to the character of these attacks was contradictory. According to the evidence of Mr. Parry, a medical man who attended the assured in both those illnesses, and also in that which caused his death in 1856, there was nothing in the illnesses of 1853 and 1854 to injure, to shorten or affect the life of the assured or make it less good. He stated that the assured recovered rapidly from them, and that his state of health afterwards was as good as ever. The evidence of other medical men conflicted with that of Mr. Parry, but it did not appear that their opinion had ever been communicated to the assured. We are informed by the learned judge that the defendants at the trial relied altogether upon the statement at the foot of the proposal and declaration actually signed by the defendant, commencing, "I, the above-mentioned John Powell Jones," and insisted that under the words

C "I am not aware of any disorder or circumstance tending to shorten my life, or to render an assurance on my life more than usually hazardous," it was enough for them to show that the illnesses of 1853 and 1854 did, in fact, tend to shorten the life of the assured, or to render an assurance upon it more than usually hazardous, without showing that the assured was aware that they were of that character. The defendants did not at the trial rely upon the declaration recited in the policy as being more stringent than that actually signed; nor did they refer to or rely upon the answers to the questions preceding the declaration commencing "I the above named," etc. The learned judge ruled, and directed the jury that if the assured honestly believed at the time he made the declaration that the bilious attacks had no effect upon his health, and did not tend to shorten his life, or to render an assurance upon his life more than usually hazardous, the fact that he was aware that he had had those attacks, even though (without his knowledge) they had such a tendency, would not defeat the policy. The jury found for the plaintiff for the amount of the policy.

In Easter Term last a rule was obtained for a new trial upon the ground of misdirection, with reference to the issues raised on the first, second, fourth and fifth pleas in this, that it was immaterial as regards the issues on the first and second pleas, whether John Powell Jones was aware of the untruth of his declaration, provided it was untrue in fact, and in this that as regards the issues on the fourth and fifth pleas, it was immaterial whether John Powell Jones knew of the consequences or effect of the attacks of 1853 and 1854, if he knew of such attacks in point of fact. The rule was fully argued before the Lord Chief Justice, CRESSWELL and WILLES, JJ., and we took time to consider.

In our opinion the course taken at the trial renders it unnecessary to pronounce an opinion on any of the points argued, except the construction of the declaration actually signed. No point was made at the trial as to the effect of the answers to the question preceding the declaration signed, or as to the plaintiff being bound by the recital in the policy though untrue, and there was an obvious good reason for abstaining from insisting upon those matters, inasmuch as they would unquestionably have been distasteful to the jury, who would, after all, assuming the defendants to be right upon those points, have had to pronounce upon the question of materiality. The defendants, therefore, cannot now be heard to argue any such points not raised at the trial; and the only one there raised and decided was, that the declaration "I am not aware of any disorder or circumstance tending to shorten my life," referred not merely to the knowledge of the assured of the disorder or circumstance but also to his knowledge that it tended to shorten life, etc.

In the argument we were referred by the defendants' counsel to several authorities, among others, Lindenau v. Desborough (1), as establishing the proposition within his knowledge, touching the subject-matters of the insurance, and that it is insurance on life or property to communicate to his underwriter all material facts within his knowledge, touching the subject-matters of the insurance, and that it is a question for the jury whether any particular part was or was not material to be communicated. It is, however, equally clear that the underwriters may, in any particular case, limit their right in this respect to that of being informed of what is in the knowledge of the assured, not only as to its existence in point of fact, but also as to its materiality, and in our opinion that is the effect of the limited declaration required in the present case, as to disorder, or circumstances tending to shorten life, or to render an insurance upon the life insured more than ordinarily hazardous. Therefore, upon the construction of that clause which alone was relied upon at the trial, we are of opinion that the direction of the learned judge was right, and that the rule for a new trial ought to be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Elections—Bribery—Payment to voter of expenses of travelling to poll—Legality.

A promise to a voter that he will be paid his expenses of travelling by railway to the poll held to be illegal under s. 2 of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854 [see now Representation of the People Act, 1949], if the promise is made conditionally on the voter voting for the promisor, but valid if the promise is unconditional. The honesty of the promisor if he does the act prohibited is immaterial.

Allen v. Hearn (1785), 1 Term. Rep. 56; 99 E.R. 969; 20 Digest (Repl.) 81, 619.

Appeal by the defendant on a bill of exceptions in an action for penalties under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854 [repealed by the Representation of the People Act, 1949]. The declaration contained a preliminary averment that, after the passing of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854, an election for two members was holden at Cambridge. It then contained seventy-nine counts, all of which were abandoned except the seventh and eighth. The seventh count was for a penalty, "for that defendant promised money to or for one Richard Carter," a voter, "in order to induce" him "to vote at the said election." The eighth count for a penalty, for that defendant "corruptly gave money to or for the said Richard Carter," then being a voter, "on account of the said Richard Carter having voted at the said election."

The action came on for trial at the Cambridge Summer Assizes, 1855, before PARKE, B. It was proved that George Brimley was the election auditor for Cambridge for the year 1854; that the election of two members took place in August, 1854, and was duly held; that Viscount Maidstone and the defendant Slade were

A two candidates on one side; that Samuel Peed was appointed the defendant's agent for election expenses; that Carter was a voter, who at the time of the election was at Huntingdon; and that he received the following letter :

"Cambridge Borough Election. Committee Room, Lion Hotel, Aug. 12, 1854.

B Sir, The Mayor having appointed Wednesday next for the nomination, and Thursday for the polling, you are earnestly requested to return to Cambridge, and record your vote in favour of Lord Maidstone and F. W. Slade, Esq., Q.C.
Yours truly, Charles Balls, Chairman. Your railway expenses will be paid."

C This letter was a printed circular, with the exception of the words "Your railway expenses will be paid," which were in manuscript. Carter, in consequence, went to Cambridge, and voted for Maidstone and Slade. The auditor, Brimley, produced the letter of Aug. 12, with a memorandum written on it: "Allowed 8s. for expenses from Huntingdon, William Thirkettle"; and another: "I allow Mr. R. Carter's claim to have 8s. for travelling expenses, S. Peed." Brimley gave evidence that it was brought to him with only the first memorandum and that he sent it back to have it vouched by Peed, and, on its being brought back with the memorandum signed by Peed, he paid Carter 8s. out of the money deposited with him on account of the defendant.

D William Thirkettle was called as a witness for the plaintiff. He stated that he was clerk to the said Samuel Peed at the election in 1854; there was a committee for conducting the election of Viscount Maidstone and Mr. Slade; Charles Balls acted as chairman of that committee; he, Thirkettle, saw Slade at the committee room, and had, in Slade's presence, heard the question of travelling expenses discussed; Slade said it was legal to pay travelling expenses to bring up the outvoters; Slade gave his opinion that such travelling expenses might be paid for the guidance of Samuel Peed; Peed asked Slade whether it would be legal to get up the outvoters and pay their legal travelling expenses, what they paid out of pocket; and he, Thirkettle, wrote the words "your railway expenses will be paid" at the bottom of the letter after Slade had said that the payment of travelling expenses was legal.

E Counsel for the defendant did not offer any evidence on his behalf, but insisted that upon the evidence so given the defendant was entitled to a verdict on the seventh and eighth counts, and prayed the learned judge so to direct the jury, but the judge held that the several matters so produced and given in evidence on the part of the plaintiff, Charles Henry Cooper, ought to be left to the jury for their consideration. His Lordship directed the jury that, if they were satisfied upon the evidence that the defendant did, by himself or any other person on his behalf
G authorised by him so to do, promise money to Richard Carter in order to induce him to vote for the defendant, they should find the seventh count for the plaintiff, although the sum of money so promised was no more than the fair and reasonable expenses of Carter's travelling from Huntingdon to Cambridge, on the day of the election, and back. The judge further said that, if the jury were satisfied upon the evidence that the defendant did, by himself or any other person on his behalf
H authorised by him so to do, give money to Carter on account of, i.e., that the moving cause of his giving such money was Carter's having voted for the defendant, they should find the eighth count for the plaintiff although the defendant honestly believed he was committing no offence thereby.

I The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff on the seventh and eighth counts, and the defendant appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 9, 1856. ALDERSON, B., read the following judgment of the majority of the court.—This case comes before us on a bill of exceptions, and the sole question to be determined is whether the exception taken to the ruling of the learned judge can be sustained. That exception is that the matters produced and given in evidence on the part of the plaintiff below are not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict, and ought not to be left to the jury. In determining this question we are to look to the declaration, and, as that follows the words of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854, on which it is founded, we have to construe that statute. We are not called on to go into any general considerations as to what would be bribery if the statute had simply prohibited that offence by that word; what we have to do is to construe a positive law which enacts (by s. 2 of the Act) that to "promise" "money" to a voter "in order to induce any voter to vote," and "corruptly" to give money to a voter "on account of such voter having voted" [see now Representation of the People Act, 1949, s. 99] are severally matters which subject to a penalty the person so promising or giving. A B

On the construction of this statute we are of opinion that a promise to a voter of his travelling expenses, conditionally on his coming and voting for the promisor, is within the first cited part of the enactment, but that a promise of travelling expenses not so conditioned is not. What the statute meant to prohibit was an act directly calculated to influence the vote, and it is impossible to say that a voter finding himself under the necessity of voting for a particular person or losing his travelling expenses, which he has been promised if he does vote, is not under an inducement to vote. The statute cannot mean to regard the condition of the promisor's mind; otherwise such a promise made to A., who has clearly already determined to vote for the promisor and whom the promisor did not propose in any respect to influence, would be out of the statute, while a promise made in the same words to B., who was not in that situation and whom it was intended to influence, would subject the promisor to the penalty. Nor can it be supposed to regard the voter's mind, as, in like way, the same promise might or might not be lawful according to the disposition of the different persons to whom it was made with the same intent. It is the act itself which the statute intended to prohibit. On the other hand, an unconditional promise of travelling expenses to a voter to go to the place of polling, with leave to him to vote or not, as and how he likes, seems to us certainly not a promise of money to induce the voter to vote, being neither a promise with that view nor directly calculated to cause it. D E F

This construction is confirmed by s. 3 of the Act [persons receiving bribes to be deemed guilty of bribery], which must have a corresponding meaning to s. 2, and which certainly would include a voter contracting for travelling expenses for his vote or his agreement to vote, and would exclude the mere unconditional receipt of those expenses. So again s. 4 only prohibits the corruptly giving of meat, etc., for the purpose of corruptly influencing a voter to give a vote. It does not prohibit the bona fide giving of such meat, etc., unconditionally, while s. 23 absolutely prohibits any giving of refreshment to any voter on the day of nomination or day of polling on account of his having polled, or being about to poll, without using any such words as "in order to induce." A giving of refreshment might clearly be within s. 23 and not within s. 2 because not given in order to induce the voter to vote, and it is difficult to see why a promise of travelling expenses should inevitably be within s. 2 when a promise of refreshment may not be. Again, consider the consequence of holding that an unconditional promise to pay travelling expenses is within the statute. Would giving a free passage by railway be so, as a gift of valuable consideration? If not, there seems an absurdity, viz., that to give the price paid for the place is illegal, but to give the place itself is not. If the free passage is within the statute, so also would be taking a person in a private carriage; and the result would be, that any one taking in his own carriage a voter to the place of election without any bargain that he should vote would be guilty of a crime or misdemeanour, punishable by fine and imprisonment, subject to a penalty of £100, and liable to be disqualified for life from voting; which is an alarming and almost an absurd consequence. [As to restrictions on the conveyance of voters to and from the poll and treating see ss. 88-90, 100 of Act of 1949.] G H I

There is no authority on the construction of this Act, and the words of previous Acts are different. The Corrupt Practices Act, 1728 (2 Geo. 2, c. 24) [repealed by

A various Acts], s. 1, required an oath to be taken by the voter that he had received no money or reward or promise for money "in order to give my vote"; and s. 7 imposed a penalty on a voter who agreed for "money or other reward" "to give his vote," and on a person who by gift or reward, or promise of gift or reward, corrupted or procured a person to vote. The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1809 (49 Geo. 3, c. 118) [repealed] prohibited agreements to give money to procure a return; B and see the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1695 (7 & 8 W. 3, c. 4) [repealed by Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854]. Under these Acts some election committees have held the payment of travelling expenses legal, and some illegal, and different opinions have been expressed by judges: see per ALDERSON, B., in Bayntun v. Cattle (1), and per TINDAL, C.J., in Bremridge v. Campbell (2), ROGERS ON ELECTIONS (7th Edn.), p. 256. But probably the apparent difference of opinion may C have arisen from the difference of the circumstances of the particular cases. It must have been known to the legislature that such payments had been held legal, and it seems strange that, if intended to be absolutely prohibited, they should not have been prohibited in express terms. It will be seen we attach no weight to the proviso at the end of s. 2 of the Act of 1854 [providing that the provisions of the section should not extend to any money paid or agreed to be paid for legal expenses D bona fide incurred at an election]. The same proviso was in the Act of 1809, s. 2, but it is nugatory, as may be seen by reading it affirmatively instead of negatively, viz., "this Act shall only extend to money paid" "for legal expenses." It is an instance of what is very common, viz., a superfluous provision ex majori cautela, or, if it has any meaning, it is that given to it by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, viz., payment to a printer or innkeeper of lawful expenses with a view indirectly to induce E him to vote. It cannot mean to legalise a promise made directly to induce a voter to vote, and no other promise is within the statute.

We are further of opinion that if the letter of Aug. 12, 1854, is evidence of a promise within the statute, viz., a promise to pay conditionally on the voter voting, and made to induce him to vote for Lord Maidstone and the defendant, then there is no evidence against the defendant that he authorised it. For we agree with the opinion he expressed, viz., that it is lawful to defray travelling expenses to bring up the outvoters, F and we cannot see that that opinion, which does not imply that the voting may be made a condition, authorised the making of a promise so conditioned, and, therefore, a promise prohibited by law. This of course would necessitate a venire de novo. But we entertain a similar opinion as to the second count. We agree with the learned judge that the pravity or honesty of intention of the defendant is immaterial if he does G the thing prohibited. But we think the word "corruptly" has a definite meaning. If, for instance, there had been a previous unlawful promise, conditional on the voter voting, or if there had been a previous understanding to that effect, or a corrupt bargain for the future, we think the case would have been within the statute. But we are clearly of opinion that merely paying the travelling expenses, honestly, with no previous engagement, is not prohibited. It was not within the former H statute: Lord Huntingtower v. Gardiner, (3), and to hold that it is within the present is to give no meaning to the word "corruptly" which appears so emphatically used in relation to the subsequent doing of an act and omitted as to the previous promise to do it—a construction which, if correct, would make a person giving money or procuring an employment within the second branch of s. 2, at any distance of time after the election, the receiver and giver being then equally unconnected with the same constituency, or any other, liable to the several penal consequences we have before referred to. We think this cannot be, and that, as I there was (for the reason above given) no evidence of a previous promise or other matter to make the gift corrupt, there was no evidence in support of the second count. On this ground also there should be a venire de novo.

WILLIAMS, J. (read by BRAMWELL, B.)—I have the misfortune to differ from the rest of the court in this case. As to the seventh count, I think there was evidence for the jury that Mr. Slade promised a voter to pay his travelling expenses, and that the object of such promise was to prevail on him to come and vote for Mr. Slade at the election. I am, therefore, of opinion that there was some evidence of a promise of money to a voter to induce him to vote, according to the allegation of that count, and the language of s. 2 of the Act of 1854. As to the eighth count, I think also that there was some evidence that Mr. Slade, in performance of a previous promise, had paid the travelling expenses of a voter who had come and voted for him at the election. This, I think, amounted to some evidence, not only that Mr. Slade had given money to the voter on account of his having voted, but that he had given it corruptly, because the promise, in my view of the statute, is to be deemed bribery. If so, a payment in performance of it is, I apprehend, a corrupt payment within the meaning of the Act. I am quite aware that the statute, as I have construed it, will act harshly, and apply to cases which can hardly have been in the contemplation of the legislature. But the language of the Act appears to me so plain and unambiguous that these considerations afford only an argument to prove that the statute was inconsiderately passed and ought to be amended.

Venire de novo.

The plaintiff appealed to the House of Lords (6 H.L.Cas. 746) who allowed the appeal on the facts, holding that, assuming the letter of Aug. 12, 1854, to be sent by the authority of the defendant Slade, there was evidence for the jury that Slade was guilty of bribery within s. 2 of the Act of 1854, for the letter meant that the payment was to be conditional on the voter voting for Slade; there was evidence for the jury of Slade having authorised the letter to be sent; and there was evidence for the jury of Slade having corruptly paid money to the voter in consequence of his voting within s. 2.

WHICKER v. HUME

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Chelmsford, L.C., Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale), July 1, 8, 12, 13, 16, 1858]

Probate—Grant—Effect—Validity of instrument as will—Domicil of testator.

The effect of a grant of probate of a will is to establish conclusively the validity of the instrument as a will, but not the domicil of the testator, a question which remains open for consideration.

Charity—Education—Gift for benefit and advancement of “education and learning in every part of the world.”

A testator gave to trustees a fund upon trust to apply and appropriate the same in such manner as they thought proper and expedient “for the benefit, advancement and propagation of education and learning in every part of the world.”

Held: the word “learning” was susceptible of various meanings, and, when given some of those meanings, it could indicate something which might be benefited by applying a fund in a way which would not be charitable, but, coupling “learning” with “education” as in the present case, it meant imparting knowledge by instruction or teaching and so was practically synonymous with education; the mere circumstance of the whole world being open to the discretion of the trustees did not prevent the gift being available as a good charitable bequest, the discretion being sufficiently specific; and, therefore, the gift was a good charitable gift.

Per LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C.—If there are two meanings of a word [in a will], one of which will effectuate and the other will defeat a testator's object, the court is bound to select that meaning of the word which will carry out the intentions and objects of the testator.

B Domicil—Definition—Intention permanently to inhabit place.

Per LORD WENSLEYDALE.—A very good definition of "domicil" is habitation in a place with the intention of remaining there for ever unless some circumstance should occur to alter the intention.

Domicil—Change of domicil—Presumption against.

C Per LORD CRANWORTH.—All courts ought to look with the greatest suspicion and jealousy at any suggested change by a person domiciled in England to a domicil in a foreign country where he must for ever be a foreigner and there must always be those difficulties which arise from the complication which exists and the conflict between the duties owed to the one country and the other.

D Per LORD WENSLEYDALE.—One must look very narrowly into the nature of the residence abroad before an Englishman living abroad is deprived of his English domicil.

Appeal from a decree of the Master of the Rolls, dated in 1851, and an order of the lords justices made in 1852, on a petition for re-hearing.

By the will of Doctor John Borthwick Gilchrist, which was made at Paris on Dec. 8, 1840, in the English form, the testator, after giving his household furniture and other things to his wife, proceeded :

"and as to and for and concerning my estate commonly called Gilchrist Place, situate at or near Sydney, in New South Wales, and my house or flat in Hunter Square, Edinburgh, with their respective appurtenances, and also all the rest and residue of my real estate and hereditaments whatsoever and wheresoever, and also as to all the rest and residue of my personal estate and effects of what nature or kind soever, I devise and bequeath the same unto and to the use of Joseph Hume, of Bryanstone Square, in the county of Middlesex, Esq., member of Parliament, Charles Holland, of Queen Street, Mayfair, in the same county, Esq., M.D., John McGregor, Esq., one of the secretaries of the Board of Trade, John Bowring, of London, Esq., Doctor of Laws, and Robert Verity, of the city of Paris, Esq., M.D., physician to the British Embassy, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, according to the natures and qualities thereof respectively, upon trust," that they should sell and convert into money all the residuary personal estate, not being ready money, and also absolutely sell and dispose of the real estate and hereditaments. The will then declared that the trustees should stand possessed of the trust-money, stocks, funds and securities upon trust out of the annual produce thereof to pay an annuity to his wife, and various legacies, and continued :

"and as to and for and concerning all the residue or surplus of the said trust-moneys, stocks, funds and securities, I direct that the trustees for the time being of this my will do and shall stand possessed thereof upon and for such trusts, intents and purposes, and with, under, and subject to such powers, provisoes and declarations as I by any codicil or codicils hereto shall direct, limit or appoint."

By a codicil which he made on the same day, he directed and appointed that the trustees or trustee for the time being of the said will

"do and shall stand possessed of and interested in the residue or surplus of the trust-moneys, stocks, funds and securities thereby to them bequeathed in trust, upon trust to apply and appropriate the same in such manner as they my said trustees or trustee shall in their absolute and uncontrolled discretion think proper and expedient for the benefit, advancement and propagation of education and learning in every part of the world, as far as circumstances will permit."

The testator died on Jan. 8, 1841. The late Walter Gilchrist Whicker was his nephew and heir-at-law, and one of the next-of-kin. The executors proved the will and codicil on July 13, 1841, in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury in solemn form, a caveat having been entered and probate being opposed by W. G. Whicker. In July, 1841, W. G. Whicker filed his bill in the Court of Chancery to administer the estate and carry into execution the trusts of the will, so far as the same were valid. The plaintiff insisted that the testator at the time of his death was domiciled either in Scotland or in France, and that his will, not being executed according to the formalities of the domicile, was void as to his personal estate, which then amounted to about £25,000, and was, therefore, distributable among his next-of-kin. Another bill was filed in 1842 by the trustees of the will. The court, by arrangement between the parties, referred it to the master to ascertain the domicile, and the master having found the domicile to be England, the plaintiff took exception to the report. On Jan. 11, 1845, LORD LANGDALE, M.R., confirmed the master's

- A report. A further report was afterwards made in 1849 setting forth the history of the testator's life, and finding from the several facts and circumstances stated that the domicile was English. Exceptions were taken to the several findings and argued, and the Master of the Rolls, by an order dated Jan. 18, 1851, held the exceptions insufficient, and overruled the same, and the report was absolutely confirmed thereafter. On May 13, 1851, the Master of the Rolls made a decree in both causes on reading affidavits to the effect that the Mortmain Act was not in force in New South Wales, by which decree the bill of W. G. Whicker was dismissed, and in the trustees' suit it was declared that the testator was domiciled in England at his death; that the real estate in Scotland did not pass by the will; and that the real estate in New South Wales did pass by the will; that the trusts of the will ought to be carried into execution; and that the disposition of the residuary real and personal estate constituted a valid and effectual charitable gift thereof. Directions as to the sale of the estate in New South Wales were given.

- W. G. Whicker presented a petition of appeal to the Lord Chancellor against so much of the decree of May 13, 1851, as dismissed the bill in Whicker v. Hume, and as declared that the real estate in New South Wales passed by the will and was a valid and effectual charitable gift. The appeal was heard before KNIGHT-BRUCE and LORD CRANWORTH, L.JJ., who dismissed the appeal on Mar. 6, 1852. W. G. Whicker appealed to the House of Lords. He having afterwards died, the appeal was revived by his son the present appellant. The respondents were the executors and devisees in trust.

- Rolt, Q.C., Green, Q.C., and Morris* for the appellants.
 E Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., Roundell Palmer, Q.C., Anderson, Q.C., and Bagshawe, Q.C., for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 16, 1858. The following opinions were delivered.

- F LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C.—On the argument at the Bar in this case, three main questions were raised: first, upon the domicile of the testator; secondly, whether the statute of mortmain [the Charitable Uses Act, 1735, repealed by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888] applied to a devise of lands in New South Wales, and rendered the devise for charitable uses void; and, thirdly, whether the trust upon which the residue was given constituted a valid charitable bequest.
- G Upon the point of domicile, an objection was made on the part of the respondents that it was not competent to the appellant to enter into that question, inasmuch as it was concluded by the probate of the will which had been granted by the Prerogative Court. It is necessary, therefore, very shortly to consider what is the effect of a grant of probate upon a question of this kind. There is no doubt that it is the province and the duty of a court of probate to ascertain what was the domicile of the party whose will is offered for probate, in order to ascertain whether it is a valid will, the testator having complied with all the requisites of the law of the country in which he was domiciled. If probate is granted of a will, that conclusively establishes in all courts that the will was executed according to the law of the country where the testator was domiciled. Supposing the fact to be that the testator was domiciled in a foreign country and the will was not executed according to the law of that country, still, if it were admitted to probate by the proper ecclesiastical court here, no other court could go back upon the factum and raise any question with respect to the validity of the will. That seems to be exemplified and established by Douglas v. Cooper (1). There a married woman, under the power of appointment in a marriage settlement, which was to be exercised by a will to be executed with certain formalities, made an instrument which was admitted to probate by the ecclesiastical court, and the Master of the Rolls held that he was concluded by the judgment of the ecclesiastical court granting probate from considering the question whether it was a will, namely, whether it was such an instrument as was required by the power, and that the office and duty of the court were confined to the consideration of the question whether that instrument was executed with the formalities which were required by the power. Therefore, I apprehend that, this will having been admitted to probate, it must be taken to be a valid will wherever it shall turn out that the testator was domiciled at the time of his death, but the place of domicile is still open for consideration, and also the validity of the bequest contained in the will, and the effect of it according to the law of the domicile of the testator. A B

The question, therefore, being open for consideration as to where the testator was domiciled at the time of his death, it will be necessary to enter shortly into the consideration of the evidence upon that subject, upon which I apprehend that your Lordships will feel no very great difficulty. The testator was a native of Scotland, born there in 1759. In 1782, being then of the age of twenty-three, he went to India, and shortly afterwards entered into the service of the East India Co. as a medical officer. He continued in the service of the East India Co. in India till 1804, and by his service with the East India Co. he acquired what has been called in several cases an Anglo-Indian domicile. He returned to his native country in 1804, and shortly afterwards he retired from the service of the East India Co. upon a pension, which he enjoyed down to the time of his death, which was in January, 1841. There is no doubt that his domicile of origin revived by his return to and residence in his native country. But it is unnecessary to pursue the circumstances of that residence, because your Lordships have already intimated a very strong opinion that in 1817 and subsequent years the circumstances showed that he had relinquished that domicile of origin, and that the real contest was between two alleged subsequently-acquired domiciles. C D E

In 1817 he quitted Scotland, never permanently to return, and established himself in London. He was a person well skilled in oriental languages and literature; he was the author of several oriental works, and at the time he came to London he had a large stock of those works on hand at his bookseller's, and it was alleged that the reason of his coming to London was to promote the sale of those works. He seemed to have considered that the best mode of advancing his object was to give public lectures on oriental literature, and about the year 1821 he obtained employment from the directors of the East India Co. as professor of the Hindustani language for three years, which was renewed at the expiration of that time for a further term of three years, and afterwards for one year, which brings us down to 1828. At the expiration of his employment under the East India Co. he lectured gratuitously, as it is said, for the purpose of facilitating the same object which he had in view and which brought him to London. Upon his first arrival in London with his wife, whom he had married in Scotland in 1808, he went into furnished lodgings, and he continued to reside with his wife in furnished lodgings down to the year 1822. He then took a furnished house in Clarges Street, at a rent of £400 a year, and he lived in that house for five years, at the end of which time he removed to another house, No. 38 in the same street, which he occupied for another year. That again brings us down to 1828. During the time that he was residing in Clarges Street, in the years 1825, 1826 and 1827, he made excursions to the continent, but kept on his house in London, and returned from time to time to his residence. In 1828 he went abroad and lived in various parts of the continent for three years, down to 1831. He then again returned to London. He appears to have remained a very short time in London in 1831. He went abroad in the same year, whether for pleasure or for health is wholly immaterial, but he remained abroad upon that last occasion from 1831 down to 1833, and again he returned to London. In May, 1833, he proposed to establish a newspaper, and for that purpose he took a house in the Strand, and he continued to hold that house, having employed persons to assist him in this undertaking, or speculation I may call it, of a newspaper, for a year, but the speculation failed. In 1834 he abandoned it, and in that year he quitted England for Paris, and only returned to England occasionally from 1834 down to the period of his death in 1841—namely, in the years 1839 and 1840. F G H I

A My lords, the question is whether during the long period which I have mentioned, from 1817 down to 1834, the testator having clearly abandoned his domicile of origin, he had not acquired a new domicile in England. I think your Lordships will entertain very little doubt that such a domicile was in point of fact acquired. It seems to me that the nature of his residence and his constant returns from the continent bring that residence completely within the definition of domicile which B is given in the Digest (Bk. 50, tit. 16, s. 203): "Unde cum profectus est, peregrinari videtur; quod si rediit peregrinari jam destitit."

If, then, he acquired a domicile in England, the question is whether he ever lost that domicile by the acquisition of another. That will depend upon whether the former domicile had been abandoned by the acquisition of a new one intentionally and actually, animo et facto. It will be necessary, therefore, to consider what were C the circumstances under which it was alleged that this French domicile was acquired. I have stated that he went abroad in the year 1834. In the year 1837 he took a second floor in the Rue Martignon in Paris for a period of three, six, or nine years, determinable after the first year's occupation upon a six months' notice, at a rent of 3,500 francs, amounting to £140 a year and with a stipulation that he should place in the apartments sufficient furniture to be a security for the rent. But the D question first of all arises: Did he manifest any intention of abandoning the English domicile which he had acquired? Let us observe what happens with reference to the English domicile. At the time he went abroad in 1834 he left with his solicitor a number of private papers and his library of books. There was a large stock of books still remaining on hand at his bookseller's. I do not lay much stress upon that circumstance. There was an insurance upon it to the extent of £6,000, but E of course he could not remove those—it would not have answered his object. He also left several trunks and boxes and packages and a bookcase at Holland's ware-rooms in Great Pulteney Street, I think, where they had been warehoused occasionally from the year 1827, and they were left there down to the year 1840, he paying warehouse rent for them during the time. In 1840 nine of those packages were removed to Tilbury's, in High Street, Marylebone, where they remained till F after the death of the testator, when a year or two afterwards they were removed by the widow and warehouse rent paid for them. The circumstance of his leaving this property in England appears to me very strongly to indicate an intention to return to this country when circumstances rendered it desirable for him to do so. He was very far advanced in life at that time, and he died at the age of eighty-two, and if he had intended to make France his permanent residence he would have G removed all his property and would never have been at the expense of having to pay warehouse rent for it. One circumstance upon this subject appears to me to be almost conclusive with respect to the fact of his domicile, in the evidence of Mr. Allen, the bookseller, in which he says:

H "On the occasion of the testator's going abroad, in or about the year 1839, he deposited with me a handsome ornamental clock and some pictures, in order that I might keep the same for the said testator during his absence and until his return to London, and that the same remained in my possession at the time of the decease of the said testator."

I think it quite clear that there is no evidence whatever of an intention to abandon the domicile which he had clearly acquired in England. Then was there any inten- I tion to reside permanently in France so as to acquire a domicile there? I leave out of consideration the expressions which may be scattered here and there through letters which are to be found in the voluminous correspondence, because I believe your Lordships will find expressions with respect to each country of an intention to reside permanently there. I think it is rather more important to consider what is the actual evidence upon this subject, upon which it appears to me to be extremely difficult for the appellant now to contend that it was a French domicile. [His LORDSHIP referred to the hearing in the courts below.] What is the result of that? The domicile of origin was abandoned, and a new domicile was acquired by his residence in England; that new domicile was never relinquished; no fresh domicile was obtained in France, consequently the English domicile remained undisturbed; and that was the domicile of the testator at the time of his death. A

[HIS LORDSHIP then dealt with the question whether the Mortmain Acts applied to New South Wales, a question which depended on the law of that State and repealed statutes of the Imperial Parliament, and so does not call for report; in any event, the law of mortmain was repealed by the Charities Act, 1960, s. 38. He held that neither by common law nor by Act of Parliament were the Mortmain Acts applicable to a devise of lands in New South Wales.] B

The only remaining question that arises upon the words of the bequest in the codicil is whether this is a good charitable bequest of the testator by which these stocks, funds and securities are given to trustees

"upon trust to apply and appropriate the same in such manner as they, my said trustees or trustee shall in their absolute and uncontrolled discretion think proper and expedient for the benefit, advancement and propagation of education and learning in every part of the world." C

It appeared to be conceded in the course of the argument that if the bequest had stopped short at the word "education" the gift would have been good. But it is said that the word "learning" is a word of very extensive signification, and that you may benefit learning in various ways which would not be charitable. In the course of the argument an illustration was borrowed from the argument of counsel before the Master of the Rolls in this case. It was suggested in the course of the argument then that if you could suppose any one instance in which learning might be benefited by applying the funds in a way that would not come within the description of a charitable object, that would make the bequest invalid and void. It appeared to me, when that argument was put forward, that that was rather begging the question, because it was first of all putting a construction, and a very extensive construction, upon the word "learning," which possibly it may be found not necessarily to bear, and it was only by putting that wide construction upon it that you could suppose that there were purposes to which the fund might be applied, which would not come within the description of a charitable object. D E F

The word "learning" is susceptible of various meanings. It is rather extraordinary that in ARCHBISHOP WHATELEY'S work upon LOGIC, it is placed among the equivocal words, that is, words which have two significations. He says:

" 'Learning' signifies either the act of acquiring knowledge, or the knowledge itself: exempli gratia, he neglects his learning; Johnson was a man of learning." G

The question is in what sense did the testator use this expression? I apprehend that if there are two meanings of a word, one of which will effectuate and the other will defeat a testator's object, the court is bound to select that meaning of the word which will carry out the intentions and objects of the testator, and I think that your Lordships are not without aid in giving the particular limited interpretation (if I may use the expression) to the word "learning," which is required for the purpose of establishing the validity of this bequest, because when you find that the testator associates with that word "learning" the word "education," I think that from the society itself in which you find the word, your Lordships may gather the meaning which it is necessary to put upon it, and that he means the word "learning" in the sense of imparting knowledge by instruction or teaching. I If this construction be correct, I apprehend there is no difficulty whatever, because it will range itself pretty much within the meaning of the word "education," although not precisely synonymous with it, and it is admitted in the argument that if the word "education" had stood alone the bequest would have been valid.

Then it is stated that the bequest is of such an extensive nature that it is impossible that it can be carried into effect, that it extends over the whole habitable world. But I apprehend, my Lords, that there is no difficulty whatever with regard to the extensive character of this gift, because the object of the trust, and the

A subject upon which the discretion of the trustees is to be exercised is specific and limited. It is for "education" and for "learning" in the sense of teaching and instruction. In that sense it appears to me that the case which was cited by the respondents, of United States of America v. Drummond (2), may be applicable, where LORD LANGDALE decided that a gift to the United States of America to found at Washington under the name of the "Smithsonian Institution, an establishment
B for the increase of knowledge among men," was a valid charity. There the area was as spacious and extensive as in the present case. The particular mode in which the object of the testator was to be carried out was described, namely, by founding an institution for the increase of knowledge among men. Here it is to instruct, to teach, and to educate throughout the world. The mere circumstance of this spacious area being open to the discretion of the trustees would not prevent
C the gift from being available as a good charitable bequest, the discretion being sufficiently pointed and specific to make it definite and certain.

Under these circumstances, my Lords, without going into the different authorities that have been cited, because I do not think it is at all necessary, it appears to me that giving that interpretation to the word "learning" which I think we are entitled to give to it, and which its association with the word "education" seems
D to me necessarily to point to, this according to all the authorities is a valid charitable bequest. Therefore, upon the whole of the case, I submit to your Lordships that the decrees of the court below ought to be affirmed.

LORD CRANWORTH.—My noble and learned friend has gone through this case so very fully that it seems to me I shall be best discharging my duty by adding
E very little to what he has already said. I will just allude very briefly to all the different points.

The first question made is one that is extremely important, namely, whether probate was or was not conclusive evidence of the domicile. I have no hesitation in saying that the affirmative of that proposition cannot be a correct exposition of the law. A probate is conclusive evidence that the instrument proved was testamentary
F according to the law of this country, but it proves nothing else. That may be illustrated in this way. Suppose there were a country in which the form of a will was exactly similar to that in this country, but in which no person could give away more than half his property. Such an instrument made in that country by a person there domiciled, when brought to probate here, would be admitted to probate as a matter of course. Probate would be conclusive that it was testamentary, but it
G would be conclusive of nothing more, for after that there would then arise the question how was the court that was to administer the property to ascertain who was entitled to it? For that purpose you must look beyond the probate to know in what country the testator was domiciled, for by the law of that country the property must be administered. Therefore, if the testator in the case I have supposed had given away all his property, consisting of £10,000, it would be the duty of the H court that had to construe the will, to say that £5,000 only could go according to the direction of the will; the other £5,000 must go in some other channel. Therefore, I think it is clear that that proposition is one that cannot be maintained. In truth, however, in the present case, in my opinion, it is utterly unimportant with reference to the result, because from the first moment when I understood this case, and saw my way into the great mass of letters and papers and evidence in the
I case, I could not entertain a moment's doubt that there is nothing here to lead to the notion of anything but an English domicile. I will not go into the circumstances prior to 1817, and only very few of them afterwards; but in 1817 I think the evidence is conclusive that this gentleman quitted Scotland intending to quit it for ever. I do not mean that he did not contemplate at some time or other going back again to visit Scotland, but that he never meant to be otherwise than a non-Scotsman—an Englishman, in truth, because he settled himself in London.

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to the evidence which has already been mentioned, and continued:] That being so, I might leave that part of the case, but I think it is not inexpedient on questions of this sort to say that I think that all courts ought to look with the greatest suspicion and jealousy at any of these questions as to change of domicile into a foreign country. You may much more easily suppose that a person having originally been living in Scotland, a Scotsman, means permanently to quit that country and come to England, or vice versa, than that he is quitting the United Kingdom in order to make his permanent home where he must for ever be a foreigner, and in a country where there must always be those difficulties which arise from the complication that exists, and the conflict between the duties that you owe to one country and the duties which you owe to the other. Circumstances may be so strong as to lead irresistibly to the inference that a person does mean quatenus in illo exuere patriam. But that is not a presumption at which we ought easily to arrive, more especially in modern times, when the facilities for travelling and the various inducements for pleasure, for curiosity, or for economy, so frequently lead persons to make temporary residences out of their native country. It appears to me, therefore, preposterous to suppose that this gentleman did not look to return to this country. Upon the subject of the domicile my noble and learned friend has alluded to one definition which he said came from the DIGEST. It is also to be found in the Codex (bk. 10, tit. 39, s. 7), and was a principle of Roman Law. There have been innumerable others, but I never saw any of them that appeared to me to assist us at all in arriving at a conclusion. In fact none of them is, properly speaking, a definition. They are all illustrations, in which those who have made them have sought to rival one another by endeavouring, as far as they can, by some epigrammatic neatness or elegance of expression, to gloss over the fact that, after all we are endeavouring to explain something clarum per obscurum. By "domicil" we mean home—the permanent home; and if you do not understand your permanent home, I am afraid that no illustration will very much help you to it. I think the best I have ever heard is one which describes the home as the place (I believe there is one definition in which the "lares" are alluded to)—the place unde non sit discessurus si nihil avocet; unde cum profectus est peregrinari videtur. I think that is the best—illustration rather than definition, I should say. That being so, I think it is perfectly clear that in this case it was competent to those who questioned this will to go into this question, and to ask where the testator was domiciled, with a view to see how the property was to be distributed. But, having done so, they have failed to show that he was domiciled anywhere else than in this country, where, therefore, the property would have to be administered.

[HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the point whether the English law of mortmain applied to New South Wales, and continued:] With regard to the charitable gift for education and learning, it is said that "benefit of learning" would not be charity. But what is the meaning of "education" and "learning?" If I remember rightly, KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., said: "I think it means just the same as if he had said 'education in learning.'" It was objected that you cannot say that, because that would alter the words. You are not to alter the words of a will, if by doing so you give a different meaning to it; but where you have expressions so very vague as these used, "for the benefit, advancement and propagation of education and learning," you must see what the words mean looking at them in their context, and there I think noscitur a sociis—learning there is the correlative of teaching; it is the being taught. It is for the benefit of educating and teaching, only that instead of teaching the correlative verb is used, namely, the being taught; the meaning is exactly the same. My noble and learned friend has pointed out that "learning" is a word of very equivocal meaning. You talk of having had a "learned education." Strictly that is nonsense. Still less is there any sense in talking about "the learned languages." What is the meaning of that? It means the languages that are learned by people of high education. But coupling the word "learning" with "education" here, it is evident that it means education, and education for the benefit of those who are to be taught. I think that impliedly it means that they are to be taught that which commonly passes in the world under the name of learning—

A that is, they are not to be taught how to tame horses or (I was going to say) how to guide ships—but perhaps that is something which might be taught, but it is for education as connected with learning that this charity was meant to be established.

It is objected that it is extended all over the world. I can only say that I think that was a very silly provision, but I cannot say that it is a fatal objection because the testator has said, not that it shall be applied all over the world—that would be absurd—but that it shall be for the benefit of mankind in general, in every part of the world, as far as circumstances will permit. In settling the scheme for this charity, it will be the duty of the court to see that the trustees make it as extensive as the nature of the income will permit. Therefore, I cannot have any doubt whatever that it is a perfectly valid charity.

C LORD WENSLEYDALE.—In this case I agree entirely with my noble and learned friends who have preceded me. The main and principal question in this case is one of fact, and it has been determined by the Master of the Rolls upon the facts in evidence in this case, that the deceased at the time of his death was domiciled in England. I think he came to a very proper conclusion. As my noble and learned friends have already stated, it is perfectly clear that he had lost his Scottish domicile and acquired an English one, and, therefore, the only remaining question was, whether, after having acquired an English domicile, he lost it by acquiring a French domicile. It is not necessary for me to add anything to the copious account which has been given by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack of the evidence in this case, or to the observations which have been made upon that evidence. It is perfectly clear to me that it is as distinctly proved as it can be that when the testator commenced to reside at Paris in 1837, he did so without the intention of making that his permanent residence. I think it is unnecessary to enter into the question of domicile, though I do not quite agree in the difficulty presented by my noble and learned friend who last spoke, as to the definition of “domicil.” There are several definitions of domicile, which appear to me pretty nearly to approach to correctness. One very good definition is this: F Habitation in a place with the intention of remaining there for ever, unless some circumstance should occur to alter the intention of the person in question. I also take the definition from the Codex, which is epigrammatically stated, and which, I think, will be found perfectly correct, that domicile is

G “In eo loco singulos habere domicilium non ambigitur, ubi quis larem, rerumque ac fortunarum suarum summam constituit; unde rursus non sit discessurus si nihil avocet; unde cum profectus est, peregrinari videtur; quod si rediit peregrinari, jam destitit.”

I think that definition, if examined in all its parts, will be found to be tolerably correct, and that, if well applied in this case, it will lead to a proper conclusion as to where the testator's domicile was at the time of his death. I perfectly agree with my noble and learned friend, that in these times of visiting abroad, transferring oneself even for years abroad, you must look very narrowly into the nature of the residence abroad before you deprive an Englishman living abroad of his English domicile. In this case I apprehend it to be perfectly clear, and the evidence alluded to leaves no doubt upon my mind that the testator went over to Paris for a temporary purpose—that he never meant to reside there permanently, but only to remain there for a time—that his domicile, his establishment, and his principal residence was meant to be in this country, and he never abandoned it. Therefore, I think that the conclusion to which the Master of the Rolls came with respect to his domicile was perfectly right.

With regard to the effect of the probate of the will in the ecclesiastical court, I take it that probate of a will in common form is conclusive evidence of the title of the executors to all personal property which the testator was capable of disposing of. It is also conclusive evidence that it was executed in due form according to the law of the country where he was domiciled at the time of the death; because it is beyond all question that the principle of mobilia sequuntur personam is completely and entirely established. I take it to be a perfectly clearly established proposition at this day, confirmed by Stanley v. Bernes (3), that the succession must be regulated according to the law of that country where the testator was domiciled at the time of his death, and that to make a valid will it must be executed according to the forms of the country where he was domiciled at the time of his death. Therefore a probate given in England, until revoked, must be considered as proof of the will being the will of a fully capable testator, and that it was executed according to the forms of the country in which he was domiciled at the time of his death. That I apprehend to be perfectly clear. If the will is proved in solemn form, as this was, the probate is incapable of being revoked, and the law of the domicile must be taken to be the law regulating the succession. At the same time, supposing it were to turn out that in some country (which is, indeed, the case in France under certain circumstances and in Scotland) that the testator had not the power of disposing of the whole of his personal property, then I agree with my noble and learned friend that this instrument will only convey such property as by the law of the country he was entitled to dispose of by will. If it could be shown that there was a part of the estate that belonged to the widow and children by the law of the country where he was domiciled, the will would have no effect upon that part. It would be a nicer question what the effect of the probate would be if he died domiciled in a country where there was no power to make a will at all. My impression is still that until the probate was revoked in solemn form it would still pass, as far as England was concerned, all the property to which the English law applied, and that the objection that he could not make any will at all ought to have been set up in opposition to the will in the ecclesiastical court, and that it could not be set up in any way afterwards. I apprehend that my noble and learned friend will hardly dispute the qualification which I have added to the proposition which he has stated.

There remain, therefore, to be considered only two questions upon the construction of this will, and the reasons which have been given by both my noble and learned friends are so very clear and satisfactory, that it is really unnecessary for me to add anything with respect to the property in New South Wales being liable to the Mortmain Acts. It seems to me to be quite out of the question, for the reasons given by both my noble and learned friends and in the court below, which I think are perfectly satisfactory.

With respect to the construction to be given to the words in question in the will, I agree entirely in the opinion that the testator did not mean any part of his property to be devoted to the purposes of learning unconnected with education, but that he meant it for education and learning connected with education, it being part of the office of education to teach. The word "learning" is an equivocal word, not merely to the extent stated by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, but to a much greater extent, for it means not only to learn in the ordinary sense, but also to teach. In the translation of the Scriptures in our authorised version, there are many instances of that sort in the Psalms. "Learning," therefore, I consider in this case equivalent to teaching; learning as part of education. No portion of this charitable fund can be devoted by the trustees for the purpose of rewarding learned men unconnected with education. It seems to me, therefore, that the conclusion which has been arrived at by the Master of the Rolls is perfectly right, and I agree entirely in the opinion which has been expressed to your Lordships by my two noble and learned friends both with respect to the construction of the will, and with respect to the will not being subject to the Statute of Mortmain.

Appeal dismissed.

HADLEY AND ANOTHER v. BAXENDALE AND OTHERS

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Parke, Alderson, Platt and Martin, BB.), February 1, 2, 23, 1854]

B

[Reported 9 Exch. 341; 23 L.J.Ex. 179; 23 L.T.O.S. 69; 18 Jur. 358;
2 W.R. 302; 2 C.L.R. 517; 156 E.R. 145]

Contract—Breach—Damages—Measure—Damage arising naturally from breach—Damage reasonably supposed to have been in contemplation of parties when contract made—Special circumstances—Effect of knowledge by both parties.

C

Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered as either arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it. If special circumstances under which the contract was made were communicated by the plaintiff to the defendant, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract which they would reasonably contemplate would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under the special circumstances so known and communicated. But if the special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he, at the most, could only be supposed to have had in his contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally, and in the great multitude of cases not affected by any special circumstances, from such a breach of contract.

Rule Nisi for a new trial obtained by the defendants on the ground that the jury had been misdirected at the trial.

The first count of the declaration stated that, before and at the time of the making by the defendants of the promises hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiffs carried on the business of millers and mealmen in partnership, and were proprietors and occupiers of the City Steam Mills, Gloucester. They were possessed of a steam-engine by means of which they worked the mills, and therein cleaned corn, ground the same into meal, and dressed the same into flour, sharps, and bran. The crank shaft of the steam-engine was broken, with the result that the engine was prevented from working, and the plaintiffs were desirous of having a new crank shaft made. They had ordered the shaft of W. Joyce & Co., of Greenwich, Kent, who had contracted to make it, but before Messrs. Joyce & Co. could complete the new shaft it was necessary that the broken shaft should be forwarded to their works at Greenwich in order that the new shaft might be made so as to fit the other parts of the engine which were not injured and so that it might be substituted for the broken shaft. The defendants were common carriers of goods and chattels for hire from Gloucester to Greenwich, carrying on business under the name of "Pickford & Co.," and the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendants, delivered to them as such carriers the broken shaft to be conveyed by the defendants from Gloucester to Messrs. Joyce & Co., at Greenwich for reward to the defendants. The plaintiffs alleged that in consideration thereof the defendants promised to convey the shaft from Gloucester to Greenwich and on the second day after the delivery of the shaft by the plaintiffs to the defendants to deliver it to Messrs. Joyce & Co., but that the defendants did not deliver the shaft to Messrs. Joyce & Co. on the second day, but neglected so to do for the space of seven days after the shaft had been delivered to them. In the second count the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants undertook to deliver the shaft to Messrs. Joyce & Co. within a reasonable time, but had failed to do so. The plaintiffs further said that by reason of the premises, the completing of the new shaft was delayed for five days, with the result that the plaintiffs were prevented from working their steam-mills, and from cleaning corn, and grinding the same into meal, and were unable to supply many of their customers with flour, sharps, and bran during that period, were obliged to buy flour to supply some of their other customers, were deprived of gains and profits which otherwise would have accrued to them, and were unable to employ their workmen to whom they were compelled to pay wages during that period. They claimed £300 damages. The defendants denied liability on the first count, and with regard to the second they paid £25 into court in satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claim under that count.

At the trial before CROMPTON, J., at Gloucester Assizes, it appeared that on May 13 a servant of the plaintiffs, whom they had sent to defendants' office, told the defendants' clerk, who was there, that the mill was stopped and the shaft must be sent immediately, and that, in answer to the inquiry when the shaft would be taken, the defendants' clerk said that if it was sent up by twelve o'clock any day it would be delivered at Greenwich on the following day. On May 14 the shaft was taken to the defendants' office, before noon, for the purpose of being conveyed to Greenwich, and the sum of £2 4s. was paid for its carriage for the whole distance. At the same time the defendants' clerk was told that a special entry, if required, should be made to hasten its delivery. The delivery of the shaft at Greenwich was delayed by some neglect; and the consequence was, that the plaintiffs did not receive the new shaft for several days after they would otherwise have done, and the working of their mill was delayed and they lost the profits they would otherwise have received. The defendants objected that the damage alleged was too remote, and that the defendants were not liable with respect to it. The

A learned judge left the case generally to the jury, who found a verdict with £25 damages beyond the amount paid into court.

The defendants obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

Keating and Dowdeswell showed cause against the rule.

Whateley, Willes and Phipson supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23, 1854. ALDERSON, B., delivered the following judgment of the court. — We think that there ought to be a new trial in this case; but, in so doing, we deem it to be expedient and necessary to state explicitly the rule which the judge, at the next trial, ought, in our opinion, to direct the jury to be governed by when they estimate the damages.

C It is, indeed, of the last importance that we should do this, for, if the jury are left without any definite rule to guide them, it will, in such cases as these, manifestly lead to the greatest injustice. The courts have done this on several occasions, and, in Blake v. Midland Rail. Co. (1), the court granted a new trial on this very ground, that the rule had not been definitely laid down to the jury by the learned judge at nisi prius. In Alder v. Keighley (2) POLLOCK, C.B., said (15 M. & W. at p. 120):

“There are certain established rules according to which the jury ought to find, and here there is a clear rule, that the amount which would have been received if the contract had been kept, is the measure of damages if the contract is broken.”

E We think the proper rule in such a case as the present is this. Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered as either arising naturally, i.e. according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it. If special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract which they would reasonably contemplate would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under the special circumstances so known and communicated.

G But, on the other hand, if these special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he, at the most, could only be supposed to have had in his contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally, and in the great multitude of cases not affected by any special circumstances, from such a breach of contract. For, had the special circumstances been known, the parties might have specially provided for the breach of contract by special terms as to the damages in that case; and of this advantage it would be very unjust to deprive them.

H The above principles are those by which we think the jury ought to be guided in estimating the damages arising out of any breach of contract. It is said that other cases, such as breaches of contract in the non-payment of money, or in the not making a good title to land, are to be treated as exceptions from this, and as governed by a conventional rule. But as, in such cases, both parties must be supposed to be cognisant of that well-known rule, these cases may, we think, be more properly classed under the rule above enunciated as to cases under known special circumstances, because there both parties may reasonably be presumed to contemplate the estimation of the amount of damages according to the conventional rule. In the present case, if we are to apply the principles above laid down, we find that the only circumstances here communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants at the time the contract was made were that the article to be carried was the broken shaft of a mill and that the plaintiffs were the millers of that mill. But how do these circumstances show reasonably that the profits of the mill must be stopped by an unreasonable delay in the delivery of the broken shaft by the carrier to the third person? Suppose the plaintiffs had another shaft in their possession put up or putting up at the time, and that they only wished to send back the broken shaft to the engineer who made it; it is clear that this would be quite consistent with the above circumstances, and yet the unreasonable delay in the delivery would have no effect upon the intermediate profits of the mill. Or, again, suppose that, at the time of the delivery to the carrier, the machinery of the mill had been in other respects defective, then, also, the same results would follow. Here it is true that the shaft was actually sent back to serve as a model for a new one, that the want of a new one was the only cause of the stoppage of the mill, and that the loss of profit really arose from not sending down the new shaft in proper time, and that this arose from the delay in delivering the broken one to serve as a model. But it is obvious that, in the great multitude of cases of millers sending off broken shafts to third persons by a carrier under ordinary circumstances, such consequences would not, in all probability, have occurred, and these special circumstances were here never communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants.

It follows, therefore, that the loss of profits here cannot reasonably be considered such a consequence of the breach of contract as could have been fairly and reasonably contemplated by both the parties when they made this contract. For such loss would neither have flowed naturally from the breach of this contract in the great multitude of such cases occurring under ordinary circumstances, nor were the special circumstances, which, perhaps, would have made it a reasonable and natural consequence of such breach of contract, communicated to or known by the defendants. The judge ought, therefore, to have told the jury that, upon the facts then before them, they ought not to take the loss of profits into consideration at all in estimating the damages. There must, therefore, be a new trial in this case.

Rule absolute.

Animal—Ram—Butting men—Averment and proof of scienter.

Animal—Ferae naturæ—Tame animal becoming fierce.

The plaintiff's declaration stated that the defendant wrongfully and injuriously kept a ram, well knowing that it was prone and accustomed to attack, butt, and injure mankind, and that the ram, while so kept by the defendant, attacked, butted, and threw down the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff was hurt and injured.

Held: the declaration was sufficient without averring that the defendant negligently kept the ram.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to set aside judgment in an action for damages for injury caused to the plaintiff by the defendant's ram.

E The declaration stated that at the time of the injury sustained by the plaintiff, the defendant wrongfully and injuriously kept a certain ram, well knowing that the ram was prone and used and accustomed to attack, butt and injure mankind; and that the ram while so kept by the defendant attacked, butted and threw down the plaintiff five times and thereby the plaintiff was hurt and injured. The defendant denied liability.

F At the trial before LORD DENMAN, C.J., at the Kent County Assizes, the plaintiff obtained a verdict with £10 damages. Subsequently, the defendant obtained a rule nisi to set aside the judgment on the ground that the claim was bad for not averring that the defendant negligently kept the ram.

Montagu Chambers and J. Brown for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule. Serjeant Shee and Wordsworth for the defendant, supported the rule.

G POLLOCK, C.B.—The case which has been decided in the Court of Queen's Bench, of May v. Burdett (1), is a binding authority upon us on this point, and we must leave the parties to go to a court of error, if they think they have any ground for reversing our judgment.

H ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion, and think we are bound by that decision. In truth, there is no distinction between the case of an animal which breaks through the tameness of its nature, and is fierce, and known by the owner to be so, and one which is feræ naturæ.

I PLATT, B.—No doubt a man has a right to keep an animal which is feræ naturæ, and nobody has a right to interfere with him in doing so, until some mischief happens, but as soon as the animal has done an injury to any person, then the act of keeping it becomes, as regards that person, an act for which the owner is responsible.

Rule discharged.

HUMBLE v. HUNTER

Agent—Principal—Agent contracting as principal—Right of real principal to take benefit of contract—Admissibility of evidence to establish agency.

The doctrine that a principal may come in and take the benefit of a contract made by his agent has no application where the agent expressly uses words importing that he is the principal.

A charterparty was executed by the plaintiff's son who described himself as "owner" of the ship. In an assumpsit on the charterparty the plaintiff sought to claim as principal.

Held: the son by describing himself as "owner" had contracted as principal, and evidence was not admissible to show that he contracted merely as the plaintiff's agent.

B Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant for a new trial in an action of assumpsit in which it was claimed that the instrument was a charterparty of affreightment made between the plaintiff, then and still being the owner of the good ship or vessel called Ann, and the defendant. Plea: Non assumpsit.

C At the trial, before WIGHTMAN, J., at the Durham Assizes, 1847, the charterparty was put in, signed, not by the plaintiff, but by her son: and the words of agreement were:

"It is . . . mutually agreed between C. J. Humble, Esq. [the son] owner of the good ship or vessel called The Ann, . . . and Jameson Hunter [the defendant]."

D Humble the son was called as a witness for the plaintiff, to prove that she was the real owner of the vessel, and that he had signed the charterparty as her agent, and not as principal. This line of examination was objected to on the ground that a person who has signed a contract expressly as principal cannot be admitted to prove, in contradiction to the written instrument, that he was merely an agent. The evidence was received, and a verdict found for the plaintiff for £141. Subsequently the defendant obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on account of the reception of this evidence.

E Knowles and F. Robinson, for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule.

Watson and Pashley, for the defendant, supported the rule.

F LORD DENMAN, C.J.—We were rather inclined at first to think that this case came within the doctrine that a principal may come in and take the benefit of a contract made by his agent. But that doctrine cannot be applied where the agent contracts as principal; and he has done so here by describing himself as "owner" of the ship. The language of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in Lucas v. De la Cour (1) (1 M. & S. at p. 250),

G "if one partner makes a contract in his individual capacity, and the other partners are willing to take the benefit of it, they must be content to do so according to the mode in which the contract was made,"

is very apposite to the present case.

I PATTESON, J.—The question in this case turns on the form of the contract. If the contract had been made in the son's name merely, without more, it might have been shown that he was agent only, and that the plaintiff was the principal. But, as the document itself represents that the son contracted as "owner," Lucas v. De La Cour (1), applies. In that case the partner who made the contract represented that the property which was the subject of it belonged to him alone. The plaintiff in the present case must be taken to have allowed her son to contract in this form, and must be bound by his act. In Robson v. Drummond (2), where Sharpe, a coachmaker, with whom Robson was a dormant partner, had agreed to furnish the defendant with a carriage for five years, at a certain yearly sum, and had retired from the business, and assigned all his interest in it to C. before the end of the first three years, it was held that an action could not be maintained by the two partners against the defendant, who returned the carriage, and refused to make the last two yearly payments. In this case I was at first in the plaintiff's favour on account of the general principle referred to by LORD DENMAN, C.J.; but the form of the contract takes the case out of that principle.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I thought at the trial that this case was governed by Skinner v. Stocks (3). But neither in that nor in any case of the kind did the contracting party give himself any special description, or make any assertion of title to the subject-matter of the contract. Here the plaintiff describes himself expressly as "owner" of the subject-matter. This brings the case within the principle of Lucas v. De La Cour (1) and the American authorities cited. A

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Robson v. Drummond (2), which PATTESON, J., has cited, seems the same, in principle, with the present case. You have a right to the benefit you contemplate from the character, credit and substance of the party with whom you contract. B

Rule absolute.

Landlord and Tenant—Master and servant—Tenant—Servant—Occupying house free of rent or rates as part remuneration for services.

There is no inconsistency between the relation of master and servant and that of landlord and tenant. A master may pay his servant by conferring on him an interest in real property, either in fee, for years, at will, or for any other estate or interest, and, if he do so, the servant becomes entitled to the legal incidents of the estate as much as if he had acquired it for any consideration other than his services. D

B., a master ropemaker in a royal dockyard had, as such, the exclusive use and occupation of a house in the dockyard for himself and his family. He paid no rent, but had the house as part remuneration for his services. No part of it was used for public purposes. He was rated and assessed in respect of the house in his own name as occupier, but all rates and taxes were paid by the paymaster-general at the dockyard also as part remuneration. If B. had not been allowed the house he would have been given an allowance for a house in addition to his salary. E

Held: he occupied the house as tenant. F

Notes. The Representation of the People Act, 1832, was repealed by s. 80, Sched. 13, of the Representation of the People Act, 1948, as amended by the Representation of the People Act, 1949, s. 1 and s. 2 of which deal with Parliamentary and local government franchise (8 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 578, 579). Although the qualification is now one of residence this case has been reported because it deals with the relation of landlord and tenant where the tenant is servant to the landlord. G

I Appeal by the objector against the decision of the revising barrister disallowing an objection to the name of the claimant being retained on the list of voters for the parish of Chatham, within the said borough, and deciding that the claimant "occupied as tenant" within s. 27 of the Representation of the People Act, 1832. Seven other cases were consolidated with the present case.

The claimant, James Burton, the party objected to, occupied a house in the dockyard at Chatham, of the value of £40 per annum from July, 1836, to September, 1842, when he moved to a house in Milton Terrace, Chatham, about a mile from the dockyard, where he now resides. The house in Milton Terrace he hired from the landlord in the usual manner, and paid a rent of £50 per annum. He was rated for it, and paid such rates in the ordinary way; and no question arose in respect of that house. With regard to the house in the dockyard, it belonged to the lords commissioners of the admiralty. The person objected to was master ropemaker in the dockyard, and as such he had the house as his residence. He paid no rent in money for it, but had it as part remuneration for his services. He had the exclusive use and occupation of the house for himself and family, and no part of it was used for public purposes; the office in which he performed his public services was away from it. He had the keys of all the doors, and no person but himself had any control over the house. He was rated to all the poor rates and assessed taxes in respect of the house, in his own name as the occupier. Such rates and taxes were paid by the paymaster-general's clerk, at the pay-office at Chatham. They were so paid as part remuneration for his services. If he had not been allowed the house, he would have had an allowance for a house in addition to his salary; and now that he had not a house in the dockyard, he was allowed one guinea per week by the admiralty in lieu of rent and rates, under the name of "lodging-money." If he had paid the poor rates himself in respect of the house in the dockyard, instead of their being paid for him as above, the admiralty would have repaid him.

William Hughes, the objector, appealed.

Kinglake for the objector.

Cockburn for the claimant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 6, 1843. TINDAL, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—In this case two questions were raised before the revising barrister, and were argued on the appeal to this court; first, whether the occupation by the claimant, James Burton, was an occupation as tenant, within s. 27 of the Representation of the People Act, 1832; secondly, whether upon the facts stated, he had paid the poor-rates, as required by the proviso in that section.

As to the first question, the facts are, that the house occupied by the claimant is situated in the dockyard at Chatham; that the claimant is master rope-maker, and, as such, had the house as his residence; that he paid no rent in money for it, but had it in part remuneration for his services, and that no part of it was used for public purposes, the office in which he performed his public services being away from it. If he had not been allowed the house, he would have had an allowance for a house in addition to his salary. Upon this state of facts the revising barrister has found that the claimant occupied as tenant; and the question in effect is whether the statement of facts shows that the decision is wrong; that is, whether it shows the occupation not to have been in the character of tenant.

On the argument, several cases were cited bearing on the question whether the house could be called the dwelling-house of the claimant in an indictment for burglary. But that question is so different from the one now in dispute, viz., whether there was a tenancy [i.e., whether he "occupy as tenant"] or not that we think it unnecessary to notice those decisions. But the cases chiefly relied on were those settlement cases in which the question has arisen whether a servant came to settle on a tenement belonging to his master within the meaning of the Poor Relief Act, 1661. The language and object of that Act are very different from those of the statute now under consideration; and, therefore, no similarity of facts in a case arising on the one Act can make it in point upon a question raised on the other. But as the court, in deciding those cases, has considered that the settlement turned on the question, whether the pauper occupied as tenant to his master, the decisions are very important on the present inquiry.

In those cases, as in this, there was no doubt of the right to exact, and the liability to render, service; but in those, as in the present case, the doubt was whether the relation of landlord and tenant subsisted between the same parties.

A There is no inconsistency in the relation of master and servant with that of landlord and tenant. A master may pay his servant by conferring on him an interest in real property, either in fee, for years, at will, or for any other estate or interest; and if he do so, the servant then becomes entitled to the legal incidents of the estate as much as if it were purchased for any other consideration.

It may be, that a servant may occupy a tenement of his master's, not by way of payment for his services, but for the purpose of performing them; it may be that he is not permitted to occupy, as a reward, in the performance of his master's contract to pay him, but required to occupy in the performance of his contract to serve his master. The settlement cases, cited in argument, established, and proceeded on, this distinction. We think it applicable to the present question; and as there is nothing in the facts stated, to show that the claimant was required to occupy the house for the performance of his services, or did occupy it in order to their performance, or that it was conducive to that purpose more than any house which he might have paid for in any other way than by his services; and, as the Case expressly finds that he had the house as part remuneration for his services, we cannot say that the conclusion at which the revising barrister has arrived is wrong.

The Case, indeed, stated that the claimant was master ropemaker, and as such had the house as his residence; but that expression is equally applicable, whether he was made tenant of the house in payment of his services as master ropemaker, or occupied it for the purpose of performing them. The fact also of having a lower salary in consequence of being allowed a house, though not immaterial, is by no means decisive; for such a fact might exist in a case in which the house was occupied for the purpose of the service, and not in the character of tenant. It may well happen that something in the service which renders it less onerous or more pleasant may cause a reduction of the salary, without being a part of the salary itself. A master may give lower wages in consequence of lodging his servants in his house, instead of requiring them to find lodgings out of it, without making them his tenants. But in the present case, upon the grounds above stated, we think the juster inference is, that there is an occupation as tenant.

F On the second question, it appears that the claimant was rated to the poor rate and assessed taxes, and that they were paid for him in part remuneration of his services. Upon this question it appears to us that the payment, being one to which the claimant was liable, and having been made on his own account by those whom he procured to make it, by giving value for it, is sufficient within s. 27 of the Representation of the People Act, 1832. The present question arising upon an Act of Parliament conferring a franchise in respect of property or ability, we think the payment, having been made in a manner equally indicative of these qualifications, is as effectual, within the spirit of the enactment, as if made by the hand of the claimant. The words of the act which require that "such person shall have paid the rate," do certainly, in their largest ordinary sense, comprehend payments made in discharge of, and procured by, such persons, as well as those made by his own hand: and the largest ordinary sense is that in which words ought to be construed, where there is nothing in the occasion on which they are used, or in the context, to restrict them.

We think, therefore, the decision of the revising barrister is right on both points.

Appeal dismissed.

Railway—Fire arising from sparks from engine—Damage to woodland—Every precaution taken by railway company to avoid such accidents.

A wood adjoining the defendants' railway was set on fire by sparks from the locomotive. On several previous occasions it had been set on fire, and the company had paid for the damage. The jury found the defendants were guilty of negligence, but it was admitted that they had taken every possible precaution to prevent accidents.

Held: the defendants, being authorised by their Act of Parliament to use locomotive engines, in the absence of negligence on their part were not responsible for any unavoidable injury thence arising.

E

Appeal by the defendants, under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, against the decision of the Court of Exchequer, reported 3 H. & N. 743, in discharging a rule of that court obtained by the defendants, to show cause why the verdict found for the plaintiff on the trial of the cause should not be set aside, and a new trial had, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and on the ground of misdirection, the judge having told the jury that no care or skill used in preventing the escape of fire from the engine would be an answer to the charge of negligence, provided they did not succeed, and also in telling the jury that the conduct of the plaintiff, in allowing his wood to be in such a combustible state, was not material.

F

The defendants were a company, who, under their special Acts and the General Railway Act incorporated therewith, were proprietors of, and used and worked the Taff Vale Railway with locomotive engines as a passenger and goods line. The plaintiff was the owner of a wood or plantation adjoining the embankment of the railway. On Mar. 14, 1856, the plaintiff's wood was discovered to be on fire, and eight acres of it were burnt. The fire originated from a spark of coal from one of the defendants' locomotive engines in the ordinary course of its working. An action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants for damage he had sustained by the fire was tried before BRAMWELL, B., and a common jury at Swansea Spring Assizes, 1858. From the evidence given by the plaintiff and his witnesses it appeared that the fire in the plaintiff's wood was first seen at a place fifty yards from the railway, that there were traces of fire extending continuously all the way between the railway and the wood, and that the railway bank was burning; that the grass on the bank had been cut three or four months before, and that there was grass of a very combustible nature growing on the bank just previous to the fire, that it was all burned, that there was a great deal of long dry feathering grass growing in the wood which was extremely combustible, that the wood was also full of small dry branches, the remains of a former cutting, and was described by the plaintiff to be in just about as safe a state as an open barrel of gunpowder would be in the Cypartha Rolling Mill. The wood, however, was in an ordinary and natural condition, and as it had been before and since the railway was made. Whether the injury was caused by the grass on the embankment being first set fire to, or whether by lighted matter thrown from the locomotive on to the plaintiff's land, was not left to or determined by the jury. The defendant's counsel did not at the trial make any objection on this ground. On the part of the defendants it was sworn that everything which was practicable had been done to the locomotive to make it safe; that a cap had been put to its chimney, that its ashpan had been secured, that it travelled at the slowest pace consistent with practical utility, and that if its funnel had been more guarded or its ashpan less free, or if its pace was slower, it could not be advantageously used; and it must be taken to be the fact that the defendants had taken every precaution and adopted every means in their power, and which science could suggest, to prevent their engines from emitting sparks, but the witness added, "we do occasionally burn our own banks now."

The learned judge left the question of negligence and improper conduct by the defendants to the jury, saying, there was evidence thereof, even though the jury believed the evidence, that everything which was practicable had been done to the locomotive to make it safe, and that it travelled at the slowest pace consistent with practical utility. He refused to leave to the jury any question arising out of the combustible character of the plaintiff's wood. The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiffs, the damages being agreed upon at £27 10s. The above-mentioned rule the Court of Exchequer afterwards on Nov. 20 last discharged. The judge did not direct the jury, as therein stated, that no care or skill used in preventing the escape of fire from the engines would be an answer to the charge of negligence, provided the defendants did not succeed in preventing it, but left the question of negligence and improper conduct as before stated. The question of whether there was evidence as to both or either counts, was entertained and dealt with by the Court of Exchequer as though open to the defendants on the rule, and without requiring any amendment thereof.

Notice of appeal against the decision of that court in discharging the rule was by leave of the court duly given by the defendants according to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. The question for the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber was whether or not the defendants were entitled to have a new trial, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury under the first count of the declaration, assuming it was true, as sworn, that everything had been done, etc. The plaintiffs contending that there was such evidence, and also that if not, the question was not open to the defendants, and also that the judge was wrong in not leaving to the jury any question arising out of the combustible character of the plaintiff's wood. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then the verdict for the plaintiff was to be set aside, and a new trial had. If the court should be of opinion in the negative, then the verdict for the plaintiff was to stand, and judgment was to be entered for £27 10s. damages, with costs of suit.

Grove, Q.C., for the plaintiff.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J. We are all of opinion that the decision of the Court of Exchequer cannot be upheld, and that the case must, therefore, go down again for a new trial. I collect from the reasons given by BRAMWELL, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer that the view taken by him at the trial, and which was afterwards upheld by the Court of Exchequer, was that when an accident of any kind arises from the use of fire as the means of propelling an engine on a railway, it must be taken to be an invariable and necessary incident to the use of fire for the purpose of propelling a locomotive. Consequently a railway company using fire for that purpose, are liable in respect of any accident which may arise, although they may have taken every known precaution for the purpose of preventing such accidents. That was the view taken by the court below so far as regards the first count of the declaration. We cannot adopt that view, it is at variance with the doctrine laid down in R. v. Pease (1), a case the authority of which we are prepared to uphold, and the reason of which I entirely approve.

- A If a private person uses any means for effecting any purpose of his own, from which more or less danger may arise, he will be responsible to those injured if any accident occur from the use of those means; but if the legislature have thought fit to interfere and have sanctioned the use of particular means for a given purpose, so long as those means are used for the purpose for which their use was sanctioned, provided always every precaution is taken which the nature of the case requires,
- B then if, notwithstanding all reasonable care and diligence, an accident does occur, the parties are not liable for any injury which is a consequence of the use of the means so sanctioned, unless they have contributed to it by some negligence. That is the doctrine of R. v. Pease (1). As far, therefore, as regards the first count, it appears from the finding of the jury that the defendants were guilty merely of using fire as a means of locomotion, and on that count the defendants are not liable.
- C As to the second, which charges the defendants with negligence in keeping the banks, that does not appear to have been specifically left to the jury. The defendants may be able to show that they were not guilty of negligence, but as to this we think there ought to be a new trial.

- D WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. To support the judgment of the court below we should hold that the defendants are liable for the mere use of the engine, without any negligence, which would be at variance with R. v. Pease (1).

- CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. We must look, as in this case, as if it was a distinct finding that there was no negligence on the part of the company, except keeping the engine. When I first heard the case I was inclined to think there was sufficient evidence to support the declaration as to the first count; but
- E I quite agree that R. v. Pease (1) decides the matter. The Act of Parliament having sanctioned the use of locomotives, the necessary consequence is that parties using them are not liable for any injury which is a necessary result of their doing so irrespective of any negligence. It is not like the case of a man keeping a dangerous animal, because keeping an animal naturally dangerous is in itself a wrongful act.

- F If a man keeps an animal which is naturally of a mild and gentle nature, it is a lawful act, and he is not responsible for any injury done by it, unless he knew it was dangerous.

- WILLES, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, although it is not without some reluctance I have come to this conclusion, as I feel compelled to reverse the decision, although I believe I agree with the reasons which influenced the majority of the
- G Court of Exchequer in the judgment as to the evidence of negligence; but as the case now stands it is stated as a fact, which must be taken as such, that the defendants used all possible precautions consistent with the practical working of the line; therefore, the question of negligence or no negligence does not now arise, and as the defendants appear to have done nothing but that which their Act enabled them to do, they are not liable.

- H BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. R. v. Pease (1) is a direct authority.

- BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The mere fact of sparks being emitted from the engine is prima facie evidence of negligence, but not only is that presumption rebutted by other evidence, but it is found as a fact that every possible precaution was taken by the defendants to prevent accidents. The question reduces
- I itself, therefore, to this: Are a railway company, using an engine with fire, responsible for any injury which may arise from the use of it, although they have taken every possible precaution to guard against it. R. v. Pease (1) decides they are not.

Appeal allowed.

BLYTH v. BIRMINGHAM WATERWORKS CO.

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Alderson, Martin and Bramwell, BB.), February 6, 1856]

[Reported 11 Exch. 781; 25 L.J.Ex. 212; 26 L.T.O.S. 261;
20 J.P. 247; 2 Jur.N.S. 333; 4 W.R. 294; 156 E.R. 1047]Negligence—Water—Escape—Frost of exceptional severity.Water Supply—Duties and liabilities of undertakers—Duty to fix fire plugs—Bursting of pipe in frost of unforeseeable severity—Need to prove negligence by undertaker.

A water company in laying down their pipes inserted properly constructed fire-plugs as safety-valves in these pipes in pursuance of their Act of Parliament. In a winter of extreme severity such as could not have been foreseen an accumulation of ice round a plug prevented it from acting properly, and as a result a large quantity of water escaped into the plaintiff's house causing damage.

Held: the fact that the precautions taken proved insufficient against the effects of such unforeseeable coldness was not sufficient to render the water company liable in negligence, and in the absence of negligence it could not be held responsible for the escape.

Per ALDERSON, B.: Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do.

Semble per BRAMWELL, B.: The plaintiff was under quite as much obligation to remove the accumulated ice and snow as the defendants.

A Appeal by the defendants, the Birmingham Waterworks Co., from a decision of the judge of the Birmingham County Court in an action tried before a jury, and brought by the plaintiff to recover for damage sustained by him by reason of the negligence of the defendants in not keeping their water-pipes and the apparatus connected therewith in proper order.

The defendants were incorporated by the statute 7 Geo. 4, c. cix, for the purpose of supplying Birmingham with water. By s. 84 of the Act it was enacted, that the company should, upon the laying down of any main-pipe or other pipe in any street, fix, at the time of laying down such pipe, a proper and sufficient fire-plug in each such street, and should deliver the key or keys of such fire-plug to the persons having the care of the engine-house in or near to the said street, and cause another key to be hung up in the watch-house in or near to the said street. By s. 87, pipes were to be eighteen inches beneath the surface of the soil. By s. 89, the mains were at all times to be kept charged with water. The defendants derived no profit from the maintenance of the plugs distinct from the general profits of the whole business, but such maintenance was one of the conditions under which they were permitted to exercise the privileges given by the Act. The main-pipe opposite the house of the plaintiff was more than eighteen inches below the surface. The fire-plug was constructed according to the best known system, and the materials of it were at the time of the accident sound and in good order.

The apparatus connected with the fire-plug was as follows: The lower part of a wooden plug was inserted in a neck, which projected above and formed part of the main. About the neck there was a bed of brickwork puddled in with clay. The plug was also enclosed in a cast iron tube, which was placed upon and fixed to the brickwork. The tube was closed at the top by a moveable iron stopper having a hole in it for the insertion of the key, by which the plug was loosened when occasion required it. The plug did not fit tight to the tube, but room was left for it to move freely. This space was necessarily left for the purpose of easily and quickly removing the wooden plug to allow the water to flow. On the removal of the wooden plug the pressure upon the main forced the water up through the neck and cap to the surface of the street.

On Feb. 24, a large quantity of water, escaping from the neck of the main, forced its way through the ground into the plaintiff's house. The apparatus had been laid down 25 years, and had worked well during that time. The defendants' engineer stated that the water might have forced its way through the brickwork round the neck of the main, and that the accident might have been caused by the frost, inasmuch as the expansion of the water would force up the plug out of the neck, and the stopper being encrusted with ice would not suffer the plug to ascend. One of the severest frosts on record set in on Jan. 15, 1855, and continued until after the accident in question. An encrustation of ice and snow had gathered about the stopper, and in the street all round, and also for some inches between the stopper and the plug. The ice had been observed on the surface of the ground for a considerable time before the accident. A short time after the accident, the company's turncock removed the ice from the stopper, took out the plug, and replaced it. The judge left it to the jury to consider whether the company had used proper care to prevent the accident. He thought, that, if the defendants had taken out the ice adhering to the plug, the accident would not have happened, and left it to the jury to say whether they ought to have removed the ice. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

Field for the defendants.

Kennedy for the plaintiff.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of opinion that there was no evidence to be left to the jury. The case turns upon the question whether the facts proved show that the defendants were guilty of negligence. Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do. The defendants might have been liable for negligence, if, unintentionally, they omitted to do that which a reasonable person would have done, or did that which a person taking reasonable precautions would not have done. A reasonable man would act with reference to the average circumstances of the temperature in ordinary years. The defendants had provided against such frosts as experience would have led men, acting prudently, to provide against; and they are not guilty of negligence, because their precautions proved insufficient against the effects of the extreme severity of the frost of 1855, which penetrated to a greater depth than any which ordinarily occurs south of the polar regions. Such a state of circumstances constitutes a contingency against which no reasonable man can provide. The result was an accident, for which the defendants cannot be held liable.

MARTIN, B. I think that the direction was not correct, and that there was no evidence for the jury. The defendants are not responsible, unless there was negligence on their part. To hold otherwise would be to make the company responsible as insurers.

BRAMWELL, B.—The Act of Parliament directed the defendants to lay down pipes, with plugs in them, as safety-valves, to prevent the bursting of the pipes. The plugs were properly made, and of proper material; but there was an accumulation of ice about this plug, which prevented it from acting properly. The defendants were not bound to keep the plugs clear. It appears to me that the plaintiff was under quite as much obligation to remove the ice and snow which had accumulated, as the defendants. However that may be, it appears to me that it would be monstrous to hold the defendants responsible because they did not foresee and prevent an accident, the cause of which was so obscure, that it was not discovered until many months after the accident had happened.

Appeal allowed.

Arrest—Arrest without warrant—Vagrant—Refusal by constable to arrest—No offence committed in his presence—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 6.

C

A constable is not bound to arrest without a warrant a man as "found offending" against the Vagrancy Act, 1824, where no offence against that Act has been committed in his presence.

D

The wife of W. had become chargeable to the parish, and it was alleged that W. had failed to maintain her within the meaning of s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824. The relieving officer met W. and gave him in charge to a constable who refused to arrest him without a warrant. On a summons against the constable for neglect of duty by refusing to arrest under s. 6 of the Act of 1824,

Held: the constable was not bound to arrest as no offence had been committed in his presence and W. was not "found offending" within s. 6 of the Act of 1824.

Notes. Section 68 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (28 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 387) restricts the power to arrest without a warrant under s. 6 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, for certain offences.

As to arrest of vagrants, see 10 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 702; and for cases, see 14 DIGEST (Repl.) 206 et seq. For s. 3 and s. 6 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, see 18 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 202, 207.

Case Stated under s. 2 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857.

G

A summons had been taken out by the appellant, Horley, before a metropolitan police magistrate at Southwark, charging the respondent, Rogers, a metropolitan police constable, with "unlawfully refusing to take into his custody James Whistler who was found offending against s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, by failing to maintain his wife," and was apprehended by Horley under s. 6 of that Act, the constable having failed to make an arrest under that section.

H

Horley stated in evidence that he was relieving officer of Christchurch district in St. Saviour's Union and that Charlotte Whistler was in the workhouse receiving relief. He went to No. 121, Waterloo Road, and found the husband of the woman who was chargeable and charged him with neglecting to support his wife. The husband said that she was quite able to support herself as she could earn 8s. a week and that she was not faithful, and Horley said that that was a question which must be settled by the magistrate. Horley then sent for a constable, told him that he was a relieving officer, that Whistler's wife was chargeable and that he wished to convey Whistler to the police court. The constable said, "I suppose you have a warrant" and on Horley saying that he had not, the constable said "his orders were not to take such a charge" and he refused to take Whistler, who refused to give his address and made off.

I

The magistrate found that the constable was not bound to take Whistler into custody as Whistler was not found "offending" against the Vagrancy Act, 1824, within s. 6 of that Act, and the summons was dismissed.

Collier, Q.C., and C. Smith for the appellant.

Ellis for the respondent.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J.—It is perfectly clear that the constable was not justified in apprehending Whistler without a warrant, since he had committed no offence in his presence, or in the presence of the party wishing to give him in charge. It was not the province of the constable to take upon himself to say whether or not any offence had been committed. It is not as where some offence under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, had been committed under his own eye—in such a case he may apprehend summarily; but where, as in this case, the supposed offence is dependent upon a variety of particulars, upon which he could only be informed by others, and which, as in this case, might be justified upon the ground of the wife's infidelity, which is a question to be ascertained elsewhere, he is not justified in interfering in this summary way.

CROMPTON, HILL and BLACKBURN, JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

RICKETTS v. CARPENTER

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Chelmsford, L.C., Lord Cranworth, Lord St. Leonards, Lord Wensleydale, and other Lords), June 3, 4, 7, July 9, 12, 15, 1858]

[Reported 7 H.L.Cas. 68; 28 L.J.Ch. 110; 33 L.T.O.S. 66;

5 Jur.N.S. 717; 11 E.R. 28]

Will—Construction—Ordinary and grammatical sense of words used—Avoidance of absurdity, or repugnance or inconsistency with intention of testator as extracted from will—Caprice—Will to be regarded as a whole—Evidence to enable understanding of words of will—Admissibility.

Per LORD WENSLEYDALE: A will must be expressed in writing, and [in construing it] that writing only is to be considered. It is now, I believe, universally admitted that in construing that writing the rule is to read it in the ordinary and grammatical sense of the words unless some obvious absurdity or some repugnance or inconsistency with the declared intentions of the writer to be extracted from the whole instrument should follow from it, and then the sense may be modified, extended, or abridged so as to avoid those consequences, but no further . . . Quite consistently with this rule words of limitation may be supplied or rejected when warranted by the immediate context or the general scheme of the will, but not merely in a conjectural hypothesis of the testator's intentions, however reasonable, in opposition to the plain and obvious sense of the instrument.

Per LORD CRANWORTH: You are never unnecessarily to introduce and interpolate words in a will, nor even to give a construction to any clause of a will, contrary to what the plain words import, without an absolute necessity by intention declared or evinced in some other part of the will. . . . Every will must by law be in writing, and it is a necessary consequence of that law that the meaning must be discovered from the writing itself, aided only by such extrinsic evidence as is necessary to enable us to understand the words which the testator has used. . . . The only reason, therefore, for proposing to put a different interpretation on the language used is the persuasion that the intention expressed by the words does not truly convey the meaning of the testator using them; that he meant to say something different from that which he has said. But this is not a legitimate ground for adopting a forced construction, or for interpolating words, unless the instrument itself enables us to do so. Where, by acting on one interpretation of the words used, we are driven to the conclusion that the person using

A them is acting capriciously, without any intelligible motive, contrary to the ordinary mode in which men in general act in similar cases, there, if the language admits of two constructions, we may reasonably and properly adopt that which avoids these anomalies, even though the construction adopted is not the most obvious or the most grammatically accurate. But if the words used are unambiguous, they cannot be departed from merely because they lead to consequences which are considered to be capricious, or even harsh and unreasonable. . . . The duty of a court of justice is not to search for the testator's meaning otherwise than by fairly interpreting the words he has used.

B Per LORD ST. LEONARDS: [In construing a will] you are not at liberty to transpose, to add, to subtract, to substitute one word for another, or to take a confined expression and enlarge it without absolute necessity; you must find an intention on the face of the will to authorise you to do so. You are at liberty to place yourself in the same situation as that in which the testator stood. You are entitled to inquire about his family, and the position in which he was placed with regard to his property. I doubt whether we should be justified in looking at the amount of property. . . . You can never dispose of property given by will except on what you can hold or construe to be words of gift of that property, but I deny that you are not at liberty to look at the whole frame of the will in order to collect the general intention. . . . For that purpose I read the whole of the will.

Will—Gift—Alteration or retraction in later part of will—Need of plain, unambiguous words.

E Per LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C.: Where there is a clear gift [in a will] it can only be altered and retracted by the most plain, unambiguous, and unequivocal words, and the court will, in dubio, justly prefer that construction of any subsequent clause which will make it consistent with the intention plainly expressed in the previous part [of the will].

F Will—Construction—Value of decision on language of one will in construing another.

Per LORD CRANWORTH: The language of one will affords very little help in enabling us to say what is the meaning of another.

Appeal from a decree of SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., reported 21 Beav. 143, whereby he declared that, upon the construction of the will of General Carpenter, his grandson Captain Carpenter, the respondent, was entitled to a vested interest in a sum

A of money set apart to answer an annuity to the testator's widow, in preference to a surviving daughter and other grandchildren, the children of deceased daughters of the testator.

The testator, after giving an annuity of £2,000 to his widow, ordered that a sum of the public securities of the East India Co. should be set apart to provide for the payment of that annuity. Then he provided that on the decease of his widow :

B "The sums provided and set apart for such payment to become the property of my son George Carpenter, now a captain in His Majesty's 41st Regiment of Foot, so far as he the said George Carpenter my son shall receive the interest on such sum during his life, and on his demise the principal sum to become the property of any child or children he may leave, born in lawful wedlock, and in such sums as my said son shall will and direct; but in case of my son dying

C before his mother, then and in that case the principal sum to be divided between the children of my daughters, the deceased Jane Ricketts and Mary Eliza Middleton (should she leave any issue) in equal portions to each."

The son George was unmarried at the time the will was made. He afterwards married and had one son, George William Wallace Carpenter, the respondent, and died in the lifetime of the testator, having been killed in the battle of Inkerman on Nov. 5, 1854, his mother being then living. The testator died on Jan. 16, 1855. His widow died on Sept. 20, 1855.

D The grandson George William Wallace Carpenter claimed to be entitled to a vested interest at the testator's death in the capital sum set apart to provide for the payment of the annuity to his grandmother, which claim was resisted by the surviving daughter of the testator and his other grandchildren on the ground that the event contemplated by the testator, upon which the fund was to go over, had taken place when George Carpenter, the son, died in his mother's lifetime. The Master of the Rolls was of opinion that the grandson was entitled in preference to the other claimants; that the testator's intention was clear that the fund should go over, not merely in the event of George Carpenter dying before his mother, but upon his dying before her and leaving no children; and that the two clauses of the sentence, as they stood, were inconsistent and repugnant, the first branch giving an estate to the children of George Carpenter, the second taking it away. His Honour was of opinion that the introduction of the words "without leaving a child" after the word "dying" in the second branch of the sentence would make it uniform and consistent. The persons adverse in their interests to the son appealed.

G Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Q.C., and Roundell Palmer, Q.C. (with him Goldsmid, Q.C., and J. L. Bird), for the appellants.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., Sir Richard Westbury, Q.C., and C. Hall for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 15, 1858. The following opinions were read.

H LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C.—In this case it is impossible to entertain any moral doubt of the testator's intention, and there is, therefore, great danger of the mind being insensibly and improperly influenced by this consideration. But, disclaiming all right to act upon any conjectural interpretation, I have arrived at a satisfactory conclusion that in the will itself there can be found an ample justification for the decree which has been pronounced.

I I entirely agree in the rules for the construction of wills laid down by my two noble and learned friends, LORD CRANWORTH and LORD WENSLEYDALE, in Grey v. Pearson (1). Where there is an uncertainty as to the meaning of any part of a will, the right of a court of construction to introduce words in case of necessity is clearly stated by LORD ST. LEONARDS in the passage quoted from Eden v. Wilson (2) (4 H.L.Cas. at p. 284). A power of this kind must, of course, be very cautiously exercised, to use the language of MR. JARMAN in his work on WILLS (2nd Edn.), p. 680 :

"not merely on a conjectural hypothesis of a testator's intention, however reasonable, in opposition to the plain and obvious sense of the language of the instrument." A

Applying the general rules to the will in the question, I have not the smallest doubt that it can be fairly and legitimately collected from the whole will to have been the intention of the testator not to permit the capital fund provided for the payment of his widow's annuity to go over to his daughter, and to the children of his deceased daughters, if his son should leave a child. The general scheme of his will seems to have been to benefit all his children and grandchildren by distributing his property among them in different proportions, the whole amount having been stated by him in a paper accompanying his will. In this distribution it was evidently his intention that the son and his children should receive the largest share, as he not only gives them the fund provided for the annuity, but also makes his son his residuary legatee. According, however, to his statement of the amount of his property, it would be nearly exhausted by the specific legacies and the annuity fund, so that a very small residue would have been enjoyed by the son, and he would have been in a less favourable position than his sister and his sister's children until the death of his mother. It is stated that at the time of the testator's death his property had very largely increased; but although a will is said to speak from the death of a testator, yet in construing his intention you must necessarily refer to the period of making the will. If the appellants are right in their construction of the will, the son of the testator's son, the principal object of his regard, would derive scarcely any benefit from the dispositions of the will, but would be superseded by all the other members of the family, themselves already the objects of distinct and independent provisions. This appears to me to be utterly inconsistent with the obvious meaning of the testator. The dispositions of his will are perfectly clear down to and inclusive of the bequest to the children of his son. A fund is set apart for the annuity to the widow. The interest of that fund, on her decease, is to be received by the son during his life, and on his demise the principal sum to become the property of any child or children he may leave, born in lawful wedlock, and in such sums as he shall will and direct. D C E F

The son of the testator, therefore, had a life-estate given to him in the fund, with a contingent interest to his children in the principal. But the son was then unmarried, and it was uncertain whether he would ever marry or have children, and so the bequests, both of the interest of the fund and of the fund itself, might have failed altogether. The testator, having the possibility of the death of his son while a bachelor in his view, provides upon its occurrence for the distribution of the fund among all the rest of the family, even to the issue of his daughter, Mrs. Middleton, who had no children at the time and is now childless, and without any reference to the possible children of his son, for whom he had provided so immediately before. The words which he used to express his intention were, "but in case of my son dying before his mother." This peculiar mode of describing the gift over does not necessarily imply that in that event the son's children, to whom before the principal sum had been given, were to be supplanted by the daughter and the other grandchildren of the testator. It may, and, consistently with the previous gift to the children of the son, would more probably mean, that they were to take the capital fund in no other event than the death of George in the lifetime of his mother—not necessarily that the fund was to be theirs absolutely on that event happening. This appears to me to leave it open to attribute a meaning to the language of the will, which will render it consistent throughout, instead of confining the construction to the narrow limits of the few words introductory of the gift over. This is not like the case put at the Bar of a gift to A., and if B. should go to Rome, or if some insignificant act should be done, then over. There the event described is wholly collateral to and unconnected with the previous limitations, and, however capricious and whimsical such a bequest may be, the testator has expressed it in clear and unambiguous terms, and it must prevail. But here the event on which the gift G H I

A over depends is implicated and involved in the prior limitations—it is not, as in the case supposed, self-interpreting, but itself creates an ambiguity which, without it, would not have existed.

There are few of the cases cited in the argument which are of much assistance in determining the construction which ought to be adopted in this case. All those on which an estate was to commence or to take effect upon certain specified events
B which never occurred, and in which the gift, therefore, altogether failed are inapplicable. This is a case in which a gift either absolute or contingent is clearly and distinctly made, and the question is whether the words on which the doubt arises took it away again on the happening of an event not consistent with it, but upon which the determination of a prior gift depended. That appears to me to be a safe and reasonable principle of construction, which was stated by LORD
C BROUGHAM in Home v. Pillans (3) (2 My. & K. at pp. 25, 26), that where there is a clear gift it “can only be altered and retracted by the most plain and unambiguous, and unequivocal words, and the court will, in dubio, justly prefer that construction of any subsequent clause which will make it consistent with the intention plainly expressed in the preceding part.”

D It was strongly insisted by the appellants' counsel that it was impossible for your Lordships to decide in favour of the respondents in this case without overruling Holmes v. Cradock (4), which, as I understand, was alleged to be a case in which there was a bequest in derogation of a previous absolute gift which was allowed to prevail. But Holmes v. Cradock (4) was a case which ranges under the head of E those to which I have already alluded, where an interest was to take effect upon an event which never happened. There the bequest was:

“if my son shall die leaving my wife, without leaving a widow or any child, after his death and my wife's I give and bequeath to Mr. Holmes £500.”

F The son survived the wife and died without leaving a widow or child, and it was held that Mr. Holmes was not entitled to the legacy as all the events had not occurred upon which it was to take effect, one of them being that the son should die leaving the wife. This was not the case then of a previous gift taken away by subsequent words, but a gift upon certain conditions which were not fulfilled. In the present case there is first a plain and unequivocal gift, and then there are words immediately following which at once produce an inconsistency, and, therefore,
G an ambiguity, in the disposition of the will. By reading the will as if it had said: “but in case of my son dying before his mother without leaving a child,” the whole is rendered plain and consistent. Are your Lordships then at liberty to supply these words as the expression of a necessary implication?

Various authorities have been cited in favour of such a course, one of the earliest of which was Spalding v. Spalding (5). That was a case very similar to the present,
H because, if the clause had been read as it stood in the will, it was expressed in clear and unambiguous words, and reasons might readily have been suggested as in this case—why, if John died, living Alice, the estate should go over to William, although John had left children, but there the very words which are wanting here for equivalent ones, were supplied, and the clause read: “if John die ‘without issue,’ living Alice.” I do not think that the application of that case can be
I weakened by the observation that the court proceeded upon the whole context of the will in aid of the construction. This only shows that you are at liberty to resort to the rest of the will to discover a different meaning from that which the words taken by themselves would convey. The importance of this case is very much increased, in my mind, by the view of it which was taken by LORD HALE, in King v. Melling (6); by LORD HARCOURT, in Kentish v. Newman (7); by LORD MACCLESFIELD, in Hewet v. Ireland (8); and by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, in Doe d. Leach v. Micklem (9). Targus v. Puget (10) is also a strong authority for supplying words similar to those which are required to be understood in this case; nor can those who consider that you are bound to adhere to the words used as conclusively expressive of a testator's meaning, object that this case and Kentish v. Newman (7) are cases of marriage articles, in which a provision may be expected to be made for the children of the marriage, because the same presumption may be raised in favour of the children of the testator's son under the present will. It is to be observed that in this case the property is vested in the children of the son independently of their father, who merely takes the interest of it for his life, and the event upon which the gift over depends is one which affects the father's life-interest only, and does not touch the estate of his children. I do not see why the construction suggested by the respondents should not be adopted—that there are two contingent independent dispositions, which are attached to the bequest to the son, so that if one takes effect the other fails. This renders the whole will sensible and consistent, while, on the contrary, the opposite construction (to use the words of WIGRAM, V.-C., in Hillersdon v. Lowe (11) is capricious and irrational, and subverts the scheme of the will, which is expressed in clear and unambiguous language in all other parts of it. It appears to me, my Lords, that, without going out of the will in search of any conjectural intention, but gathering the testator's meaning from a consideration of the whole of his dispositions, and more especially from the contexts of the particular passage upon which the question arises, your Lordships will not be frustrating, but fulfilling, the testator's intention by determining that Captain Carpenter took a vested interest in the capital of the fund set apart to answer the annuity to the testator's widow, and that the decree of the Master of the Rolls should, therefore, be affirmed.

I think it right to add, that my noble and learned friend, LORD BROUGHAM, who heard the first argument upon this case, at the first conclusion of it agreed with me in the view which I then took, and which I have now expressed. Of course my noble and learned friend is not to be bound at all by that opinion as a final opinion, inasmuch as he has not heard the second argument, which was ordered by your Lordships; much less, of course, can he be bound by the reasons which I have expressed for the opinion which I have formed, and in which, as I have stated, he concurred.

LORD CRANWORTH.—The question in this case is one of which there have of late been many instances in all the courts, it being how far there are or are not circumstances apparent on the face of a written instrument enabling those who have to interpret it to give to the words used a meaning not consistent with their ordinary import.

The rule has been repeated in various forms of language by almost every court and judge in very numerous cases. I refer to a case which was decided in this House, Eden v. Wilson (2), in which it was very clearly laid down that you are never unnecessarily to introduce and interpolate words in a will, nor even to give a construction to any clause of a will, contrary to what the plain words import, without an absolute necessity by intention declared or evinced in some other part of the will. The question is whether we can discover, from intention evinced in this will, an absolute necessity for interpolating the words "without leaving issue," or for construing the words, "in case of my son dying before his mother," as meaning in case of his dying without leaving issue. I confess that I cannot. Every will must by law be in writing, and it is a necessary consequence of that law that the meaning must be discovered from the writing itself, aided only by such extrinsic evidence as is necessary in order to enable us to understand the words which the testator has used. No extrinsic evidence can be necessary here for such a purpose, except the fact that the son was a bachelor, if, indeed, that is necessary. If the testator's intention really was that, unless his son survived his mother, the son's children living at his death should take no part of the money set apart to secure the annuity, he could not have more aptly expressed what he intended. The words have exactly met his wishes. The only reason, therefore, for proposing to put a different interpretation on the language used is the persuasion that the intention ex-

- A pressed by the words does not truly convey the meaning of the testator using them; that he meant to say something different from that which he has said. But this is not a legitimate ground for adopting a forced construction, or for interpolating words, unless the instrument itself enables us to do so. Where, by acting on one interpretation of the words used, we are driven to the conclusion that the person using them is acting capriciously, without any intelligible motive, contrary to the
- B ordinary mode in which men in general act in similar cases, there, if the language admits of two constructions, we may reasonably and properly adopt that which avoids these anomalies, even though the construction adopted is not the most obvious or the most grammatically accurate. But if the words used are unambiguous, they cannot be departed from merely because they lead to consequences which are considered to be capricious, or even harsh and unreasonable.
- C In this case there is no ambiguity in the words used, and the only question is whether we can discover on the face of the will enough to enable us to say that the words "without leaving issue" must be supplied. It was fairly put in argument that cases might be supposed in which the intention not to give anything to the son's children in the event of the son dying in his mother's lifetime would have been reasonable and not capricious. Suppose for instance a real estate was settled
- D on the wife for her life, and at her death was to go to the son's children if the son was then dead, otherwise to other persons, the provision now in question would then have been quite reasonable; we should then have seen the motive of the testator. Still the words to be construed would have been the same then as now, and I know of no principle which enables us to construe plain unambiguous words differently when we can and when we cannot discover the motive influencing the
- E person by whom they are used. It was argued that the words must be read as a gift over, subject to the preceding gifts, but to take effect only in the case of the son dying before his mother. On any other hypothesis, it was said, the construction will deprive not only the son's children, but also the testator's widow, of the benefit of the fund set apart for her benefit, the language being that if the son dies in his mother's lifetime, then and in that case (which, as was argued, must mean
- F at that time and on that event) the principal sum was to be divided. I do not agree with this argument. "Then," as there used, is not an adverb of time but of relation. The widow was at all events to have her annuity for her life, and the fund set apart to secure it must have been meant to endure till the annuity should terminate. There is nothing in the language preventing a construction which secures this object, and, indeed, the testator expressly provides for the fund going
- G over on her decease, that is, not before her decease. It is not disputed that, if there had been no settlement directed of the fund—that is, if it had been given absolutely to the son without more—then the gift over on the events which happened must have taken effect.

- It has occurred to me, as one mode of looking at this case, to read it as if all the words: "so far as the said George Carpenter, my son, shall receive the interest
- H on such sum during his life, and on his demise the principal sum to become the property of any child or children he may leave born in lawful wedlock, and in such sums as my said son shall will and direct"—the words, in short, which direct the settlement—were read as if in a parenthesis—that is, as if the son were restricted to a life-estate, with remainder to his children in something already given to him absolutely, but not giving to the children anything which is not taken out of what
- I had been previously given to the son himself, so that when his interest is defeated that of his children fails also. This might explain what was passing in the testator's mind, as if he had said: "I give the fund to my son, but if he dies before my wife, then I give it over, and I direct that my son shall not take what I have given him absolutely, but that it shall be considered as settled on him for life, and afterwards on any children he may leave." I do not mean to represent myself as having any confident opinion that I can thus trace the workings of the testator's mind. Indeed that is, as I conceive, scarcely within the province of a court of justice, whose duty it is not to search for the testator's meaning otherwise than by fairly interpreting the words he has used. Confining myself to this duty, I have come to the conclusion that there is nothing to show that the words now in question are to be construed otherwise than according to their obvious meaning; that the testator has given the fund over to the children of his daughters, in the event of his son dying in the lifetime of his mother; that there is nothing on the face of the will enabling me to say that the gift over was only to take effect if the son should leave no issue; that the son did die in his mother's lifetime, and therefore, that the daughters' children are entitled. A B

I have, in justice to the parties who have so much at stake in this cause, to the very able argument at your Lordships' Bar, to the high authority of the Master of the Rolls, and to the opinion of three of your Lordships who concur with him, looked attentively to all the authorities to which we were referred, but I have not found—nor, indeed, did I expect to find—anything which helps me in coming to a conclusion. The language of one will affords very little help in enabling us to say what is the meaning of another. Many of the cases relied on were cases where a gift over being made on a failure of issue after a gift to some particular classes of issue, that issue on whose failure the gift over is to take effect has been considered to be confined to that class only in whose favour the prior gift was made. This was Malcolm v. Taylor (12), and Ellicombe v. Gompertz (13); and there are many other similar decisions, the subject being discussed by SIR JAMES WIGRAM, in Hillersden v. Lowe (11). Such a construction has been called the referential construction, and cannot, I think, apply to a case like this where the event on which the gift over is to take effect is a collateral independent event. Again, in Spalding v. Spalding (5), a gift of a real estate to the wife for life, with remainder to the eldest son in tail, but if the eldest son should die, living the wife, then to the second son, was held necessarily to mean, on the whole context of the will, if he should die without issue, leaving the wife, for on no other construction could all the provisions of the will in the opinion of the court take effect. So in Home v. Pillans (3), where there were legacies to the testator's two nieces, when they should attain twenty-one, but in the event of either dying leaving a child, then to that child, the nieces were held to take absolute interests on attaining twenty-one, the Lord Chancellor holding, contrary to what had been held by SIR JOHN LEACH, that the gift over was only intended to provide against the event of the nieces dying during minority. All the cases coming within this class are very ably discussed by the present Master of the Rolls in Edwards v. Edwards (14). We were referred to several cases where the question was as to the construction of marriage articles. They clearly can afford no guide to us in construing a will. It has always been held that in a will we have nothing to guide us but the language of the testator. In marriage articles courts have always felt warranted in saying that such a construction must be put on them as will accomplish their object, namely, the securing a provision for the children. They must in general be read as if there was a recital in them—"whereas the object of the parties is to secure a provision for the children of the now intended marriage." None of the cases cited has appeared to me to render us any material assistance in deciding this case, and, therefore, on the short ground that there is no doubt as to the meaning of the words used considered by themselves, and nothing so far as I can discover on the face of the will enabling me to say that the words are to have any other than their plain primary meaning, I am compelled to come to the opinion that the decree below was wrong, and ought to be reversed. C D E F G H I

LORD ST. LEONARDS.—This is a case of great anxiety, because, although we may collect the intention of the testator from the whole of the will, yet there is considerable difficulty in giving effect to that intention according to the rules of law. It has been well remarked that hard cases make bad law, and I, therefore, made a covenant with myself to guard myself as much as I could, and to keep within what I consider to be the strict rules of law applicable to a case of this kind.

We are all agreed about the general rules of law upon this subject. My noble

A and learned friend on the Woolsack has referred to what fell from me in Eden v. Wilson (2). I stated very strongly in that case the rule, and I still adhere to it, and I do not mean to run counter to it. You are not at liberty to transpose, to add, to subtract, to substitute one word for another, or to take a confined expression and enlarge it without absolute necessity; you must find an intention upon the face of the will to authorise you to do so. When I say upon the face of the will, you are

B by settled rules of law at liberty to place yourself in the same situation as that in which the testator himself stood. You are entitled to inquire about his family, and the position in which he was placed with regard to his property. I doubt whether we should be justified in looking to the amount of the property, although it is referred to. I disclaim at present any intention whatever of referring to the amount of the property which he then possessed: it is personal property. He

C enumerates his property. He does not profess to dispose of it as constituting all his property; on the contrary, he makes his son residuary legatee. It would be dangerous, therefore, in my apprehension, to found the decision of this case judicially upon the amount of the property.

As I admit that you may, and must, look at the intention, that intention is to be gathered, in my apprehension, from the whole of the instrument. It was very

D elaborately argued that you can only look to what is called the proximate declaration of intention—that is, dealing with the exact property which is in dispute. No doubt you never can dispose of property given by will except upon what you can hold or construe to be words of gift of that property, but I deny that you are not at liberty to look at the whole frame of the will in order to collect the general intention.

I first of all ask what is the general intention of this testator? For that purpose

E I read the whole of his will. I am at liberty to do so, but I am not at liberty to take the disposition of another property and contrast it with the one in question, because he may have intended to give one property in one way and another property in another way. But if, upon the whole frame of the will, I am satisfied of what was his general intention, I start with that general intention; it will not enable me to alter words, but, having ascertained the intention, I then have to ask whether I can or cannot so construe the words actually used as to carry out the

F intention. I agree with my noble and learned friend, that you are not to collect intention by conjecture. I wholly disclaim anything approaching to conjecture. I must have conviction in order to bring my mind to a judicial determination in favour of an operation beyond the actual word used. Then disclaiming conjecture and founding upon words used, yet I may read those words according to the intention of the testator which I find upon the face of the instrument. Therefore, I

G conceive that I may first of all look at the instrument throughout in order to collect the intention. If I were asked, morally speaking, what the intention of this testator was, I cannot have the slightest doubt about it. He had an only son who was rather of mature age, I think about thirty-four. He was at a time of life at which he was likely to marry, and likely to have a family, and not provided for. He had

H two daughters who had died, and had left children, and he had a living daughter without children, and he intended to provide for them all, and he did so. To the children of those who were dead he gave at once a large provision actually to vest in them. When you are talking of ambiguity there is ambiguity even there, for he talks of a class that are to survive, without telling you whom they are to survive, or when. So this is not a will without ambiguity elsewhere, for in the gifts with

I regard to the children and grandchildren there are ambiguous words that require construction. He provides for the daughter who was unmarried, and for her children, if she should have any, and if she should not, he gives it over. When we come to what was the first and principal object of his bounty, his son, he gives the property in question to his wife for life, then to his son for life, and then to his son's children. I will assume it to be who should be living at his death. If we stop there, of course there is no question; and we must stop there with this observation, that the property is actually given without any doubt or ambiguity to the son's children. So that, if it is to be taken away from the children, we must find clear words to effect that object. It is to be observed that there is no contingency expressed or implied, upon which the property is given to the children. When we come to the real point on which the case depends, upon any construction of that clause, all the interest of the children is not taken away, because it is only upon the contingency of the mother surviving the son that you take it away at all. As regards construction, we must bear in mind that there is a great difference between gifts cutting down a previous interest, which, of course always may be, and generally are, introduced with some word stronger than "but," but I am not inclined to dwell on a word. In the gift to the children of the son there is no contingency expressed, and in the gift over of that property upon the contingency of the wife surviving the son, there is no exclusion whatever referred to of the children. I find, therefore, the property remaining in the children, and in my apprehension clearly unaffected (speaking still of intention) by the gift over. A B C

[His LORDSHIP referred to Anon. (15); Atkins v. Atkins (16); Wallop v. Darby (17); Luxford v. Cheeke (18); Spalding v. Spalding (5); King v. Melling (6); Newburgh v. Newburgh (19); Langston v. Langston (20); Doe d. Leach v. Micklem (9); Perrin v. Lyon (21); Pearsall v. Simpson (22) and Malcolm v. Taylor (12), and continued:] In Malcolm v. Taylor (12) there is a rule laid down to which I entirely accede, that it is natural to suppose that gifts over, when they are not expressed so as clearly to defeat a previous gift, are intended to succeed that gift and in succession. The court in that case acted on that rule, and I am ready to support that as a rule, and to advise your Lordships to act upon it. But in applying that rule to this case, remember you start with a clear, unambiguous, unconditional, unrestricted gift to the children of the son, and you have to displace that. If I find anything subsequently directly opposed to it, I sacrifice the whole intention, which I collect with respect to the children of the son, and I agree that the words of the will must operate. But if I find an imperfect intention expressed in the gift over, I must come to one of two conclusions, either an intent to cut down that gift over which is imperfectly expressed, or I must supply words. Remember, there is not here a word saying: "If he shall die, leaving his mother, though he shall leave children, for whom I have before provided." There is not a word of exclusion. F Therefore, I must either give a construction which will cut down the previous gift, or I must supply words. One or other must be done. Nobody can read the words and say they are to be taken plainly without consideration and without construction. I must construe them; and, construing them as I do, I clearly gather, to my apprehension, without the slightest doubt, what was the intention of the testator, viz., a gift over, if the son died without children, leaving his mother living at his death. G Therefore, I consider the construction at which I have arrived in favour of this gift to the children of the son is clearly warranted by the intention of the testator. I have, as already said, carefully guarded myself not to advise your Lordships to give effect to the intention, unless I can do so without disturbing any rule of law or any authority. I have satisfied myself that I can give this advice to your Lordships without disturbing any rule of law. In advising your Lordships to adopt H that construction, I do so, I think, consistently with every rule that has been stated. I break in upon no rule; I disturb no settled axiom of law; I endeavour, and always have endeavoured, to keep within those rules; but, while I have endeavoured to keep within those rules I have also endeavoured, where I could, to make them bend, so as properly to meet the justice of the case; therefore, I agree with my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor, that the decree of the Master of the Rolls I should be affirmed.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—The case now before your Lordships is one of many of a similar nature, in which the mind is imperceptibly tempted to swerve from the established rules of construction by the apparent hardship of the case, and the highly probable conjecture that the testator never could have intended that which he has expressed. Nothing can be more reasonable than to suppose that he meant in this case to have provided that his son's children should take the property be-

A queathed to the father for life after his death, whether he died in his mother's lifetime or afterwards. But the rules which are to govern the construction of wills as well as all other written instruments, are now very clearly established, and it is impossible to overrate the importance, notwithstanding all the temptations from supposed hardship or probable intention, of steadily, strictly, and faithfully adhering to those rules for the sake of the great interests of society in avoiding litigation and

B affording the only chance of obtaining as much certainty in the construction of wills as such a subject is capable of. As Mr. FEARNE says (CONTINGENT REMAINDERS, p. 173):

"It is better that the intentions of twenty testators every week should fail of effect than that the rules should be departed from upon which the security of titles and the general enjoyment of property so essentially depend."

C The question in expounding a will, as SIR JAMES WIGRAM most correctly states in his excellent work, ADMISSION OF EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE IN AID OF THE INTERPRETATION OF WILLS (2nd Edn.), p. 7, is "not what the testator meant, but what is the meaning of his words." The use of the expression that the intention of the testator is to be the guide, unaccompanied with the constant explanation that it is to be sought in his words, and a rigorous attention to it, is apt to lead the mind insensibly to speculate upon what the testator may be supposed to have intended to do, instead of strictly attending to the true question, which is what that which he has written means. His will must be expressed in writing, and that writing only is to be considered. It is now, I believe, universally admitted that in construing that writing the rule is to read it in the ordinary and grammatical sense of the words unless some obvious

D absurdity or some repugnance or inconsistency with the declared intentions of the writer to be extracted from the whole instrument should follow from it, and then the sense may be modified, extended, or abridged, so as to avoid those consequences, but no further. This rule in substance is laid down by BURTON, J., in the frequently quoted case of Warburton v. Loveland d. Ivie (23). It had been previously described as "a rule of common sense as strong as can be," by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Doe d. Usher v. Jessep (24). It is stated as "a cardinal rule, from which if we depart we launch into a sea of difficulties not easy to fathom," by LORD CRANWORTH, L.J., in Gundry v. Pinniger (25); and is "the golden rule," when applied to Acts of Parliament by JERVIS, C.J., in Mattison v. Hart (26), and by MAULE, J., as "the most general of rules, a rule of great utility," in Gether v. Capper (27). Many other authorities might be cited, but there is no doubt of the excellence and

E generality of the rule. Quite consistently with this rule words and limitations may be supplied or rejected when warranted by the immediate context or the general scheme of the will, but not merely in a conjectural hypothesis of the testator's intentions, however reasonable, in opposition to the plain and obvious sense of the instrument. Whether this modification of the rule is stated to be that words may be supplied where so warranted, or that words are never supplied, but that the

G instrument may be read as if the words were supplied, is matter of no consequence whatever. The meaning is precisely the same, but the latter mode of stating the proposition is skilful, and has a tendency to obtain a more ready acquiescence in the introduction of other words. [In applying this rule to the present case his Lordship arrived at the same conclusion as LORD CRANWORTH.]

WILDE AND ANOTHER v. GIBSON

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Cottenham, L.C., Lord Brougham and Lord Campbell), May 22, 23, 25, June 6, 1848]

[Reported 1 H.L.Cas. 605; 12 Jur. 527; 9 E.R. 897]

Contract—Rescission—Fraud—Non-disclosure of material fact—Need to prove actual knowledge of fact—Proof of constructive notice insufficient.

Where a charge of fraud is based on the non-disclosure by the defendant, one party to a contract, of a material fact the plaintiff must prove actual knowledge of the fact by the defendant. It is not sufficient to prove that he had constructive notice of the fact.

Per LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.: The effect of constructive notice in cases where it is applicable, as in contests between equities of innocent parties, is sufficiently severe, and is only resorted to from the necessity of finding some ground for giving preference between equities otherwise equal; it cannot be applied in support of an imputation of direct personal fraud and misrepresentation.

Fraud—Need to be clearly and distinctly alleged, and equally clearly and distinctly proved.

Per LORD BROUGHAM: Where fraud is to be the ground of the proceeding and is made the principle on which the relief is sought at the hands of the court, that fraud must be clearly and distinctly alleged, and, if so alleged, must equally be clearly and distinctly proved.

Sale of Land—Contract—Rescission—Misrepresentation or concealment—Relief from completing purchase—Conveyance already executed—Need to prove actual fraud.

Per LORD CAMPBELL: If there be, in any way whatsoever, misrepresentation or concealment which is material to the purchaser, a court of equity will not compel him to complete the purchase, but where the conveyance has been executed I apprehend that a court of equity will set aside the conveyance only on the ground of actual fraud. There would be no safety for the transactions of mankind if, upon a discovery being made at any distance of time of a material fact not disclosed to the purchaser of which the vendor had merely constructive notice, a conveyance which had been executed could be set aside.

Appeal from a decree and order of KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C., upon a bill filed by the respondent for rescinding a contract made by him in August, 1838, for the purchase of a messuage and land from the appellant, Lady Wilde, then Augusta Emma D'Este, spinster, and completed by a conveyance and payment of the purchase money in December the same year. A

The messuage and land in question formed part of an estate at Ramsgate, formerly the property of Lady Augusta De Ameland, the appellant's mother, who conveyed it to her in fee in 1829. In August, 1838, Mademoiselle D'Este caused the estate to be set up for sale by auction in lots for building purposes. Printed particulars and conditions of sale were published. The fifth condition was that B

"no purchaser shall be entitled to require or inspect any title prior to the deeds by which the property was respectively conveyed to the vendor or Lady Augusta De Ameland respectively; or to require or inspect the title to any of the respective roads, walks, or pleasure-grounds, or to any of the premises, except the lot or lots purchased by him or her; and the vendor shall not be called upon to identify the respective lots with the former descriptions thereof; and all the recitals and statements contained in any document shall be deemed conclusive evidence thereof." C

The last of the lots, which was that purchased by the respondent, was described in the particulars as

"the capital freehold mansion-house, called Mount Albion, with the offices, etc., and pleasure grounds, containing about one acre, two roods, twenty-three perches." D

In a map annexed to the particulars and conditions, the last mentioned lot was described as bounded on the south-west by a new road, called "Victoria Road," forty feet wide; and on the east side of that road, next the lot was marked a dotted line, representing the boundary between the liberty or town of Ramsgate and the parish of St. Lawrence. E

The respondent, having been declared the purchaser of this lot at the price of £2,030, paid a deposit of £20 per cent. to the auctioneer. In the abstract of title, which was soon afterwards delivered to him by Messrs. Farrer and Parkinson [the vendor's solicitors], Mademoiselle D'Este was represented to be owner in fee of the premises which were described as adjoining the Liberty Way, and unaffected by any right or liberty of way over them. The respondent having accepted the title, the premises were conveyed to him by lease and release, dated December 28 and 29, 1838. In the release the premises were described as being situate without the liberty of Ramsgate, in the parish of St. Lawrence, and bounded as they appeared in the map before mentioned. The respondent paid the remainder of the purchase money, and, being then let into possession, proceeded to build a wall enclosing the premises. In May, 1839, the officers of the parish of St. Lawrence applied to him for payment of two shillings and sixpence as an annual acknowledgment to that parish of a right of way, called the Liberty Way, through the property on the Victoria Road side, within the wall which he had just erected there, and in January, 1840, the officers of the town of Ramsgate applied for the like payment as a similar acknowledgment to their town. They stated that the Liberty Way was situated partly within the liberty of the town, and partly in the parish of St. Lawrence, and that part of it was in fact included within the newly erected wall. It appeared, on further inquiry, that in the year 1820 Lady De Ameland had, with the permission of the officers of the town and of the parish, enclosed so much of the Liberty Way as passed through her property, and that she executed a deed poll which recited F that the consent of the vestry of the parish was given to such enclosure on condition that, during the time the Liberty Way should be so enclosed, another road, six feet wide, without the enclosure, should be found and maintained by her, and at the expense of her and her heirs; that the part of the Liberty Way so enclosed should be marked out by proper mark-stones; that a deed should be executed by her, acknowledging for her and her heirs, that the Way was enclosed by permission and not of right, and that the same should be opened whenever the parish vestry should require it; and that by way of acknowledgment a yearly rent of five shillings G H I

A should be reserved in respect of such enclosed way, payable in moieties to the surveyors of the town and parish, by all which terms and conditions she (Lady De Ameland) declared that she, her heirs and assigns, were bound. It was also ascertained that this nominal rent to the town and parish had been regularly paid by the agents of Lady De Ameland and of Mademoiselle D'Este.

B The respondent refused to pay the sums so demanded, and, conceiving that the value of the property was materially diminished by such a claim and that his enjoyment of it was liable to be disturbed at any time, applied to the vendor's solicitors to take it back, and repay his purchase money, with his costs and other expenses. The application was refused.

C The respondent then filed his bill against Mademoiselle D'Este, stating the aforementioned facts and that, until the rent was demanded of him, he was wholly ignorant that any part of the Liberty Way was included within the purchased premises, or that the town or parish had any right of way through any part of them. The bill charged that the defendant, as well as Lady De Ameland, had acknowledged such right of way; that no notice thereof, express or constructive, was given to the respondent, and that from the abstract of title delivered to him, and from the map annexed to the particulars and conditions of sale, it appeared, and he, in fact, believed, that the Liberty Way was not included within the premises, but adjoined them, and was comprised in the Victoria Road. He charged that the defendant fraudulently concealed from him the deed poll of 1820, and the fact that Lady De Ameland and herself had regularly paid the yearly rents of two shillings and sixpence to the town and parish in acknowledgment of their right to the Way; that the premises were represented to him to be wholly situated within the parish of St. Lawrence and without the liberty of Ramsgate; and that, if he had been aware of the claim to a right of way, and that the Liberty Way was included within the premises sold to him, he would not have purchased them. The bill prayed that the sale and the deeds of lease and release might be declared fraudulent and void; that the sale might be set aside, and the deeds delivered up to be cancelled; that an account might be taken of all sums expended by the respondent in the repairs of the mansion house and the erection of the boundary wall, and of his costs and expenses incidental to the purchase and conveyance of the premises; and that the defendant might be decreed to repay to the respondent the purchase money, together with what should be found due to him upon the taking of the account for costs and expenses, with interest, he offering to account for the rents and profits during his possession of the premises, and to re-convey them.

G The appellant, Lady Wilde, in her answer to the bill, after admitting the facts already stated, denied all fraudulent concealment on the part of her and her agents, pleaded that the respondent was too late in making his claim, and said that, if he was entitled to any relief, it was by way of compensation for that one-half in breadth of the supposed way, if it ever existed in the premises purchased by the respondent, had merged in the Victoria Road, a public highway, of which the respondent was cognizant.

H The Vice-Chancellor, upon the hearing of the cause in November, 1843, came to the conclusion that there was a right of way over the lands purchased by the respondent and that it might be claimed and exercised, and, although he, and also the respondent's counsel, acquitted the appellant of all wilful fraud or intention of concealment, he decreed that the purchase and conveyance were void, and that they should be set aside. In August, 1845, Mademoiselle D'Este married Sir Thomas Wilde, and they afterwards appealed against the decree, and an order consequential thereto.

Bethell and James Wilde for the appellants.

Swanston and Sir Fitzroy Kelly for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

June 6, 1848. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.—The bill in this case prays that the conveyance may be set aside as fraudulent, but the decree, although it sets aside the conveyance, departs from the usual course in such cases, and, abstaining from any imputation of fraud, declares that under the circumstances the contract was void, and, as a supposed necessary consequence, that the conveyance ought to be cancelled. This is not an immaterial circumstance, as it strongly implies that the vice-chancellor was satisfied that the evidence did not establish any case of fraud. If that be so in fact, the first question will be whether, upon a bill framed as the bill in this case is, a decree can be supported upon any other ground than the case of fraud distinctly charged by the bill. A B

It is in all cases important to consider how far the case proved is in conformity with the case alleged, but it is peculiarly so in cases founded upon alleged fraud imputing dishonest practices to the defendants. It is in all such cases essential to prevent the proceedings from becoming instruments of unfounded slander. Plaintiffs should bear in mind that imputations which cannot be supported will not only not profit them, but may debar them from that relief to which they might be entitled upon other grounds, if properly brought forward. The bill in this case imputes direct fraud, consisting in this, that the defendant, at the time of the sale, knew the contents of the deed of 1820—that the Liberty Road passed over the portion of land purchased by the plaintiff—and fraudulently concealed from the plaintiff the knowledge of that deed, and of that fact. The payment of the two and sixpence to the parish of St. Lawrence and to the liberty of Ramsgate, is not charged as amounting to a knowledge of the road, but only as evidence of knowledge of the deed. The fraud imputed is personal and direct, but the language of the decree abstains from affirming any such case, and the vice-chancellor in his judgment disclaims any intention of supporting the decree upon the affirmative of such imputation, which was indeed impossible, the truth of such imputation having been distinctly disproved by the evidence on both sides. The deed of 1820 never was in the possession of the defendant, and there is not only no proof of her having had any knowledge of the deed or of its contents, before the sale and conveyance was made to the plaintiff, but the contrary is clearly proved, and no attempt is made to establish such alleged knowledge. If therefore, the case proved had been such as, upon a proper bill for that purpose, would have entitled the plaintiff to the relief prayed, the frame of this bill would probably have been a sufficient answer to the claim to such relief as this seeks. The decision upon this appeal does not, however, in my opinion, rest upon that ground. The case alleged might have been sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to relief, if it had been proved, but the case proved would not have been sufficient for that purpose, though properly alleged. D E F G

The result of the evidence is simply that there was, prior to the year 1820, a right of way passing through the land belonging to Lady Augusta De Ameland towards the sea, but the particular line of the way was not at that time ascertained. In that year the officers of St. Lawrence and of Ramsgate, assuming that the way followed the boundary between the parish and the liberty of Ramsgate, and consequently that the centre of the way was the true boundary, put up three stones, marking out that line, and, if they were correct in their supposition, the land sold to the plaintiff, abutting upon the line of those stones, would comprise within itself one-half of such way, the width of which, however, is left uncertain. But that depends entirely upon the correctness of the supposition that the centre of the way was the real boundary which the evidence proves to have been very doubtful, the precise line of way over land then unenclosed being at that time incapable of being perfectly ascertained. That the centre of the way and the boundary line had been considered as identical, depended upon what had taken place in 1820, of which the defendant had no knowledge. The deed of 1820, if the defendant had known its contents, would not have informed her of this, nor would the payment of the two sums of two shillings and sixpence each, for although from both it might have been inferred that in some point the way touched upon land in the liberty and in the parish, neither would show that it touched upon both at that H I

A point of the plaintiff's land; and, as to these payments, I must observe that there is not sufficient evidence that the defendant knew that such payments had been made, and none that she knew for what they were made. Mr. Wightwick, indeed, proves that he paid these sums as agent or manager for the defendant, and that he entered such payment in her accounts; but such accounts were not proved or produced in evidence, and there is, therefore, no proof of the manner in which such payments were entered, and unless such entries had specified that the payments to St. Lawrence were made in respect of the right of way running over the land bought by the plaintiff, they would not have given any information as to the fact of which the plaintiff complains.

It is true that the deed, if it had been in the possession of the defendant, and the payment, if known to her, might have amounted to constructive notice, being sufficient to put a party upon inquiry. The effect of constructive notice in cases where it is applicable, as in contests between equities of innocent parties, is sufficiently severe, and is only resorted to from the necessity of finding some ground for giving preference between equities otherwise equal, but this is the first time I ever knew it applied in support of an imputation of direct personal fraud and misrepresentation. The two things cannot exist together—there can be no direct personal fraud without intention, and there can be no intention without knowledge of the fact concealed or misrepresented, and if there be knowledge, the case of constructive notice cannot arise. It would be absorbed in the proof of knowledge. It must be observed that there is not in this case any misrepresentation or statement in the nature of a warranty—the utmost that has or can be alleged is that there was a dealing with the property, particularly with respect to the covenant to build a wall, inconsistent with there being any right of way—but no statement or warranty that there was not a right of way, a distinction important to be borne in mind, when this case is compared to actions for deceit; in which, under such circumstances, the scienter is the essence.

An attempt was made to affect the defendant with all the knowledge which Mr. Wightwick possessed upon this subject, but that attempt failed for many reasons. In the first place, although he was the agent of the defendant for certain purposes connected with the sale, it does not appear that the purchaser had any communication with him respecting the purchase, except in paying a stipulated percentage towards the expenses of a terrace walk. The whole transaction of the purchase was conducted in London. The documents preparatory to and connected with the purchase may have been prepared by Mr. Wightwick; but, when prepared, they became the representations of the vendor, and what knowledge the person may have had who prepared those documents is immaterial. He may have been guilty of neglect towards his employer in permitting the preparation and use of inaccurate papers on her behalf, but not having had any personal communication with the purchaser, the latter cannot complain of having been deceived by any misrepresentation made by him. It is, however, clear that Mr. Wightwick himself cannot, as between these parties, be considered as having more than constructive notice of the fact alleged by the plaintiff. What knowledge he acquired in 1820 is immaterial, as, at that time, he was not acting for the defendant or for Lady Augusta De Ameland, and although he, after he became their agent, paid the two shillings and sixpence to St. Lawrence and Ramsgate for the defendant, such payment would only show that some right of way had been supposed to pass over some part of the land in each of those districts, but could only be constructive notice of its affecting the plaintiff's land. It must also be observed that, if the plaintiff had relied upon any supposed fraud or misrepresentation on the part of Mr. Wightwick, he was bound so to have stated his case, and he cannot be permitted to support an alleged case of personal and direct fraud by a principal, by proving misconduct in an agent not named in the bill for that purpose.

If, therefore, the right of way complained of by the plaintiff had been proved—which it is not—and if the case relied upon had been properly stated in the bill—which it is not—the case would have come to this, that the defendant had no knowledge of the fact complained of, but had within her reach means of such knowledge. That is constructive notice of a fact, not consistent indeed with the mode of dealing with the property, but as to which no representation of any kind took place. And the question would arise whether such circumstances would entitle the purchaser to have a completed purchase set aside. It has not been, and cannot be, contended that it could, but attempts were made to support the decree upon arguments resting, as it appeared to me, upon a supposition that there might be direct personal fraud consistent with perfect freedom from any personal blame or misconduct. The direct personal fraud was attempted to be supported by some expression in Mr. Wightwick's deposition, in which he says that the defendant had knowledge of the right of way claimed over the land purchased by the plaintiff, but he does not say how he proved such knowledge, and, coupled with what he said respecting the deed and the payments, he must be understood as intending to say that the defendant must, as he supposes, have known of the claim, from the fact of such deed having been executed, and such payments having been made.

Finding that there was no evidence to support the charge of direct personal fraud imputed by the bill, and that the evidence, at most, only raised a case of constructive notice of the fact complained of by the plaintiff, I waited with some curiosity to learn the ground or authority on which the decree was to be supported. The case principally relied upon was Edwards v. M'Leay (1); but that case cannot assist the respondent, for in that case there was knowledge in the vendor and a false representation, both of which are wanting in the present case. LORD ELDON says (2 Swan. at p. 289):

"I agree with the Master of the Rolls that if one party makes a representation which he knows to be false, but the falsehood of which the other party had no means of knowing, this court will rescind the contract."

A case much more in point is that of Legge v. Croker (2), in which the lessor had assured the lessee that there was no right of way over the ground; that there had been formerly, but that it had been legally stopped by a grand jury presentment forty years before. It turned out that there was a footway, the presentment applying only to a carriage way, and the lessee was convicted of obstructing it, whereupon he filed his bill to be relieved from the lease; but LORD MANNERS dismissed his bill, saying (1 Ball & B. at p. 514):

"If there were a wilful misrepresentation, the plaintiff might be entitled to relief, but the lessor conceived himself entitled in point of law in asserting that there existed no right of way; it cannot be called a misrepresentation."

That was a much stronger case against the lessor than the present is against the vendor.

The result appears to me to be (i) that the plaintiff, having rested his case in the bill upon imputations of direct personal misrepresentation and fraud, cannot be permitted to support it upon any other ground; and (ii) that the evidence at the most proves only constructive notice of the fact upon the non-communication of which the plaintiff founds his claim for setting aside his completed purchase; and that nothing short of positive knowledge can be sufficient for that purpose. The case alleged is not proved, and the case proved is not alleged; and if it had been, would not have been sufficient to support the decree. The conclusion to which I have come is, that the decree ought to be reversed, and the bill dismissed, with costs.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I entirely concur with my noble and learned friend in the conclusion to which he has arrived, being clearly of opinion that the case alleged has not been proved, and that the case which has been proved is not sufficient to support the prayer of the bill to have the indentures of lease and release, the conveyance, given up and cancelled on the ground stated in the bill and assumed in the decree.
